No one can prepare you or help you find what you are looking for. What you need is love. Love is the only thing that can make the meantime worthwhile. Once you find true love, true self love, and unconditional love, things will look, feel and be a lot better all of the time. But what do you do in the meantime?

We all want to experience the light of love. The problem is that our windows are dirty. The windows of our heart and mind are streaked with past pains and hurts, past memories and disappointments. In the meantime, we keep looking through the foggy window, trying to convince ourselves that we see the real thing. It's not and we know it, but we can't seem to figure out what to do until the real thing comes along. Author, Iyanla Vanzant, suggests what we must do is clean. We must clean the floors, windows, walls, closets and the corners of our mind. We must do this through mental housekeeping from the basement up. The work starts at the basement and working its way up from the first floor, second floor, third floor and the ultimate destination, the attic.

The book begins with knowing where we live. Most of us start out in the basement of life. This is where we are first programmed about worldly affairs and love affairs. It is here that we develop our self image and bump into issues of self value and self worth. It is in the basement that we develop issues related to survival where we learn and act out passive/aggressive behavior patterns that determine our life approach.

On the first floor we must do our laundry. You must realize you are the love you speak, the companionship you desire. You are the only one who can do what you are looking for someone else to do. What are you looking at? What are you looking for and with whom? These are the questions essential to developing true love. One of life's most difficult challenges is to look at yourself honestly, acknowledging and accepting what you see. When you take responsibility for what you have or haven't done when you are telling the absolute truth, you will know whether to stay in the meantime or not.

On the second floor we take out the trash. When you are on this floor you know what the problem is, but you do not know what to do about it. You know what you want but not how to bring it about in your life. When you are on the second floor in the meantime of life you must learn to trust. Trust yourself and the process, above all trust love. Love will always bring you the highest representation of your expectations. Fear brings your worst nightmare. Trust grows from willingness, the lesson you learned in the basement.

Living on the third floor will be a piece of cake because you have all of the information you need to move yourself through the situation. You know love heals almost anything on the third floor. This does not mean you will no longer have normal, emotional responses to life but you will quickly recover from an emotional upheaval because you apply love to the situation.

The attic of life's house is the final destination. The consciousness with which children live, totally trusting, totally free, accepting of self and others. The attic of life's house is about living with a childlike heart through all things with the good even after you are told otherwise. In the attic you have made a commitment to shift your consciousness into a state of unconditional self love.

In the Meantime is a powerful book which forces you to take a good spiritual cleansing of the soul. Vanzant's step by step approach is simple yet very rewarding. As with her other guides to attaining the highest possible spiritual life for oneself she gets you thinking and questioning what path in life you are taking. In The Meantime is a guide, with which you want to have a hi–lighter in hand, as you will want to refer back to it over and over again, long after you have completed the book. A definite read for anyone who wants to improve their life in general.

Can one bullet kill a nation?

How long will they kill our prophets
While we stand aside and look?
–Bob Marley
"Redemption Song"

It only took a fraction of a second to end his life.

Before he could draw one last breath of Memphis air, Martin Luther King, Jr. was shot and killed.

The bullet wasted no time as it traveled down the long barrel of the .30–06 hunting rifle, screaming at the speed of sound, until finally reaching its target with horrifying accuracy. It offered no apologies and felt no remorse. Its job had been done. King was dead.

Humphrey Brown

Thirty years after the shooting of the greatest civil rights leader in history, questions are still left unanswered. Is James Earl Ray, the man convicted of killing King, really the killer? If so, what was his motive? What does the FBI have, if anything, to do with it all?

Conspiracy theorists and investigators alike, are trying to answer these and many other questions. All the while, a black nation lies stagnant and without direction, never quite recovering from the loss. The repercussions that occurred the minute King died are still being felt today. The baton was never passed.

Like Malcolm X before him, King was in the midst of taking the fight for equality to another level. A poor people's march on Washington was King's last major project before he was killed. The idea was to get one million poor people to Washington D.C. and show how powerful the oppressed can be. It would have been King's greatest feat. The idea alone is enough to make a barrel full of Washington stiff shirts extremely nervous.

Who did he think he was anyway? This is the Capitol of the United States we're talking about. You can't even fly over it, much less bring a million poor people to camp out on its lawn.

King didn't care what they said he could and could not do. He was going to do it. For the freedom of his people and the love of his God, Martin Luther King, Jr. was going to turn Washington inside out.

That kind of power in the hands of a black man was too much. There was no way King would have been allowed to do all that he planned. His death was their reckoning.

All last week, we were bombarded with theories as to who killed our leader and who was to blame. Everyone has their own opinion. Everyone has a story. Yet, buried deep underneath the forum and panel discussions, there lies a greater mystery. It's not a question directed to the conspirators. It's not in the interest of finding who gave the command.

The mystery that really needs to be investigated is the mystery behind the continued silencing of black leaders. How long will we continue to look as our leaders are put away? Why are we so content with letting things go? Thirty years have passed since King's death and we haven't had a leader of his magnitude since. It's as if the bullet that killed King killed all of black leadership.

King's legacy didn't die thirty years ago. It's still there, staring you in the face, asking you for spare change as you walk on by. It's in the scorching flames of a church burning to the ground in Alabama. In the hearts and minds of every black collegiate trying to get that degree; it's there.

Today, you have the entire King family backing the words of William Pepper, Ray's lawyer, in proving Ray's innocents.

Would Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. really want his family to be so preoccupied with his death, that they've neglected what it is they must do in life? Would he want that for any of his people?

It's been thirty years.

There's no denying the significance of getting to the bottom of King's assassination, but there is greater work to be done. I don't doubt for an instant that Dr. King wants his people to continue our fight for equality and racial peace. The man wasn't that selfish in life. Why would he be in death? He knew he wasn't going to make it to the mountain top with us, but he promised us that we would make it. We aren't there yet.

We let them kill our prophets and we die? We can't let it end so simply. Malcolm, King, Evans, Newton; they were all silenced by the gun.

Silence carries no echo.

It's time to project their words and dreams, not their silence. If we really want to commemorate these great leaders, we have to make strides for Black America and the world.

The King family is fighting for Earl Ray's freedom, when does the fight continue for ours?

See it from my prospective: part two

I ended last time by speaking of the assistant manager of my residential apartment complex, and her "relating to the commoners" project. I shall continue. She'll (referring to this assistant manager) waltz through the neighborhood with her nose in the air passing judgement on others because she can afford the nice fancy car and the fancy clothing. Well, I own quite a few suits myself and my children do, too. We wear them on Sundays when we go to church. I choose to wear my jeans and T–shirts when I'm working in the kitchen (at my job). On the other hand, give me a desk job and I'll dress for the occasion.

"When you see me busting my behind in the kitchen with my stained apron and sweat on my forehead — don't judge me.."

Lamont Edwards Jr.

What's that? Didn't go far enough within the educational system? Nope, I can't speak too much on the developments in computerized technology and don't ask me about the White House scandals and how they affect the future of this country. Why are our troops in Iraq anyway?

Talk to me about affirmative action and I'll tell you about it. Isn't that the way it goes with "us common black folks?" We only know what we need to know in order to survive and you wonder why we're frustrated. You wonder why there's this rough edge to our personality. You pay thousands of dollars to educate yourself at a university which promotes "diversity" (among other things) yet you graduate not knowing what real life is all about! And I'm ignorant... No, just a poor black man in a town where you can count the number of black people on your fingers.

Ignorant? No, just a father trying to raise his children and, at the same time, keeping his eyes open wide in search of that equal opportunity everyone raves about. Where is it? "Well, maybe if you did things differently then..." "Maybe if you did this now..." I may not have always made the "right" choices, but I made choices as I lived my life relevant to the circumstances I've encountered.

As far as what I'm doing now, I'm raising my children in a safe community surrounded by friends and loved ones. It would be nice to have a job that pays well, it would be nice to have a decent car, it would be nice to have period! Like a lot of us who don't have, I make due with what I got and feel content with what I'm doing.

So when I sit on my stairs, socialize with my friends and drink beer — don't judge me. When you see me busting my behind in the kitchen with my stained apron and sweat on my forehead — don't judge me. When I'm walking down East Pleasant street with my children close behind — don't judge me. If it's later than usual and my friends drop by my apartment — don't judge me.

This attempt to assimilate the uneducated minority is useless. I will remain strong and teach my children to walk with their heads held high. I will teach them to discredit the countless judgemental groups who seem to find it okay to stare and gawk. However, let it be known that those who judge are the ones who are ignorant.

Oh, wait a minute, here they come now... "Hey, dinner will be ready in a minute. You have homework? Let me see..."

High priestess of folk–punk delivers her message

By Marty Keane

ANI DIFRANCO / CHRIS BROWN & KATE FENNER
William D. Mullins Center
Apr. 4

So much of today's music merely fills an aural void in people's ears, which is sufficient for most casual listeners. How do you think Hootie sold 15 million copies? If it sounds pleasant, that's all that really matters.

Ani DiFranco's music, however, is a different story entirely. It demands complete attention. She's racked up a considerable cult audience on the basis of her convictions — a feat not easily accomplished. Not surprisingly, DiFranco can lay claim to one of the most devoted fanbases around.

The DIY princess of urban folk for the '90s, DiFranco conjures up a curious brew of anger, humor and poignancy as she articulates what it means to be a post–modern feminist in the context of a male–dominated existence. To the masses, her music is an acquired taste — easier to appreciate than it is to listen to.

Responding in kind, her fans wholeheartedly embrace these ideals and aren't afraid to let their true colors shine through, wildly cheering every individualistic lyric — as they did Saturday night at the William D. Mullins Center.

For all their cult popularity, DiFranco's studio albums are frequently hampered by mannered performances, which is precisely what her live show is not. In concert, DiFranco's music morphs into a force far more powerful than merely words and music. It becomes a medium for an emotional catharsis, a purging of listeners' pent–up feelings, if you will.

To the many who see her as a lonely beacon of light on a desolate plain of diluted corporate rock, DiFranco is a source of inspiration and rightfully so.

Playing just the fourth date of an extended U.S. trek that will see her play Great Woods on June 24, DiFranco and her three–piece backing band showed their rust early. New bassist Jason Mercer seemed to be searching for a groove and longtime drummer Andy Stochansky played with slight hesitation, perhaps due to the sheer newness of the material. Opening with two new, unreleased songs — "Hat Shaped" and "Virtue" — the sold out crowd's jubilant reaction was based more on the fact that they were in the presence of their idol rather than the music itself, which is fine because DiFranco herself embodies the message of female individuality. Her music is merely the vehicle.

In her 90–minute performance at the Mullins Center, DiFranco played her songs with an infectious energy, frequently twisting the melody lines and digressing into entertaining stories and jokes. "Pulse" was transformed into a rambling soliloquy, winding its way seamlessly from tale to tale whilst keeping the loose musical patchwork of the studio version intact.

After the tentative start, the band became more cohesive and intuitive on "Cradle and All," and really hit stride with the joyful anthem, "Shameless," which ended the main set.

Most of her songs, especially the acoustic folk–tinged earlier material, lack traditional melodicism. DiFranco's distinctively funky acoustic guitar riffs are played in a harsh strumming style that belie the tumult of her intensely personal lyrics. It's an approach that works, but leads to a bit too much repetition, at least on record. In a live setting though, it's simply enthralling.

By choosing to highlight songs off the newly released Little Plastic Castle album (a work which sees DiFranco expanding her sonic palette significantly), DiFranco utilized a more varied percussion attack, with the addition of a keyboardist the most obvious change. DiFranco aired eight of the dozen songs on the album, closing the evening with the live favorite "Gravel," a song that's been in her repertoire for several years.

Openers Chris Brown and Kate Fenner showcased tunes off their excellent release Other People's Heavens. According to Brown, the Canadian duo are "ready for the long haul in the States."

Live Yo La Tengo enthralls

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN
Ira Kaplan and Yo La Tengo kept a sold out audience mesmerized at Amherst College Friday evening.

By Mike Mascaro

YO LA TENGO / RICHARD DAVIES
Amherst College Frontroom
Apr. 3

The question you have to ask yourself after a show like the one at Amherst College Friday night is: "Why can't the University of Massachusetts put on shows like this?"

Seriously though, it was a small show, it sold out, it was well done and attracted a great crowd. It had everything. So why was it at Amherst College and not here at UMass? Well, it's probably because they have their act together and aren't hiding behind any false morals or scapegoats. It's not like these bands aren't looking to play at colleges. They want us to call. And one area college did. This, folks, is what UMass should have, and what Amherst does have. Maybe they could book our shows. They don't seem to sit on their hands as much.

Ahem.

Now that I'm done with my soapbox antics, I'll get on to reviewing the show.

After seeing the Yo La Tengo show on Friday, I realized that to truly appreciate this band, you have to see them live. I've always liked their albums, but their brand of pop really lends itself to live settings. With the drums and bass providing a strong backbeat, the guitar is allowed to expand and wail. Different instruments are used and the players switch on and off throughout the show. It really makes you appreciate them more to see it done right in front of you.

Yo La Tengo opened with a beautiful little sustained, drumless song, listed on the set list as "Looney." The beauty and the fragility of the number held the crowd mesmerized and silent; at one point you could hear guitarist Ira Kaplan's guitar wires scrapping and flopping on the floor around him on the stage. The tension in the song was built expertly by the whole band. At one point Kaplan used one of his guitar pedals to sample a snippet of feedback that he looped and used as a rhythm to the rest of the song. From there they went into a new version of the beautiful "Autumn Sweater," with brushes being used on the drums and vocals that echoed each other.

A lot of the songs were pulled from their last album, I Can Hear the Heart Beating As One, including the masterful "Sugarcube." The heartbreaking "Stockholm Syndrome" was a highlight of the show, but "Center of Gravity" (samba– flavored by way of a Casio) and Electr–O–Pura's "Tom Courtenay" were very close.

The show could be called transcendent, and I usually don't throw that term around aimlessly. Songs lasted for minutes upon minutes and you wouldn't even know. Instead of being enraptured with themselves, as is the case at too many indie rock shows these days, the crowd was enthralled with the music. Everyone had a good time and no one rubbed up against me too much — always a plus.

Richard Davies and his band opened up the show with some songs and a lot of chatter. In between some very good electric folk songs, Davies and the band had fun bantering with the crowd, making him more endearing than a straight up show would have made him. At one point, Davies told a story about how the bassist thought they were going to play at UMass Amherst, not Amherst College. I guess they just don't know how things are run around here.

which led to the only Hawks run of the game. However, the junior battled back to scatter only three more hits over the final six innings to notch his fourth win and third complete game of the year.

"It was a tough day to get loose, but as the game went on it seemed like I was getting stronger," Cooke said. "It's my job to keep the ball on the ground, because I know that our defense is solid. It seems like I can always count on them."

Cameron also went the distance in game two, allowing seven walks, but always seemed to come through with a big strikeout when he needed to.

"It was just a dogfight with myself out there," Cameron said. "But the team played well and gave me the run support that we needed to win."

Puleri, however, may have saved the best for last yesterday. The Lee native went seven shutout innings while allowing only three hits before giving way to Veracka for the final two innings of work.

"It was a cold day today, and I was just trying to throw the ball over the plate, said Puleri, who moves to 3–1 with the win. "I tried to spot my fastball and my change–up was good. When I'm able to do that it only makes me a better pitcher."

So the Massachusetts staff took a big step forward this weekend with three solid outings. Pitching will be a key factor as the season wears on, as it will obviously be impossible for the Minutemen offense to maintain a pace which has them scoring almost 10 runs per contest.

"The pitching staff had a great weekend. Hopefully that will be able to carry us, and give us some momentum for the rest of the year," said UMass second baseman Muchie Dagliere, who went 5–for–10 with five RBI this weekend.

"This weekend was real big for us (the staff). We have a lot of talented pitchers on this team who can shut down the opposition," Puleri said. "If we have our pitching going, then we're going to be a tough team to beat."

er Mandy Galas started things off with an infield single. With senior left fielder Tracey Osier up at the plate, Galas stole second on the first pitch.

Osier then hit a single of her own, sending Galas to third base and scoring position. Senior first base player Kim Guttridge, UMass' top hitter with a .393 batting average, was unable to reach first on her hit, but she brought in Galas for UMass' first score.

Braunstein led off with a double to centerfield as Wolcott was hit by St. Joe's pitcher Mike Gondas. Lang advanced the runners with a sacrifice and Skeffington reached on a walk. With the bases loaded, Mazzaferro reached first on four balls to force Braunstein home. Dagliere powered in two more runs off a long single in the outfield.

Gondras recorded the loss for the Hawks as he allowed four walks to fall to 1–3. Jim Boylan finished off the last two innings, not allowing any runs.

Saturday's doubleheader was a showcase for Massachusetts hitters. In the first game, UMass was trailing 1–0 until the third inning when it pounded St. Joseph's hurler Jack Marcellus for seven hits and eight runs.

Doug Clark and Pete Gautreau opened the floodgates with twin triples as Clark scored the first run. Brian Samela ripped a double into right field to drive in Gautreau. Braunstein, Wolcott and Lang all tallied singles as Skeffington reached on an error. Dagliere rapped a single to center field to continue the cycle, as the Hawk's defense could not find a way out of the jam, adding two more errors to their game total of five. Clark would later smash a home run in the sixth to put away St. Joe's.

Bill Cooke went the distance, improving his record to 3–1.

In the second game, Ryan Cameron (3–2) went the full seven frames, though he struggled early on, running many St. Joe's batters to a full count. The offense stole the show, scattering six runs over the first five innings.

With Osier having advanced to third base junior shortstop Becky George hit a single. The Flyer defense acted too hesitantly and Osier snuck home for a run.

UMass finished things off with a flurry of scoring in the third inning. George got herself on first base with a single to left field, then advanced to second with a steal on the next pitch. After freshman third base player Annie Smith's pop fly was caught in left field, Faessler stepped up to the plate to perform her magic.

"I was just thinking about hitting it hard and getting a base hit," Faessler said. "I was only concerned about putting it into play."

Faessler's hit flew to the far left, and kept going, giving her a third career home run. With the score at 4–0, UMass continued through the batting order and ran up the score. Octavia Brown had a single that brought in senior designated player Liz Wagner. Galas then had a hit of her own, a triple to left field that brought freshman right fielder Debbie Tomoguchi in. With Osier's RBI single that brought in Galas, the Minutewomen had set the Flyers up for a mercy ruling.

Freshman Carrie Jeffries pitched in the game, allowing five hits and getting seven strikeouts. Junior pitcher Danielle Henderson pitched in the loss, allowing four hits and totaling 10 strikeouts. The Flyers had a triple play against UMass in the first inning of the first game. Guttridge's hit to left field was caught, and Galas and Osier were tagged out on second and third base. The Flyers scored the only run of the game in fourth Inning. Jennifer Thompson scored the unearned run.

In Saturday's games UMass swept St. Bonaventure in the Minutewomen's home opener, 4–0 and 6–2. Henderson pitched the shutout in the first game, allowing just one hit, striking out 11 and walking six. She relieved Wagner in the fourth inning of the second game, after Wagner allowed three hits and two runs. Henderson earned the save, allowing one hit and striking out five.

UMass will play again tomorrow in a makeup game with Hartford.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Take care that in an attempt to guide someone you know well, you are not crossing the line and offering nothing but insult.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Your enthusiasm is on the rise, and you are taking on an almost child-like attitude about all that is available to you at this time.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Do not try to lord it over anyone today! You can learn a lesson in the use of power from a Cancer native, who is tactful to a fault.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Today, your usual unwillingness to confront someone directly may give way, allowing you to face a challenger head-on.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — A project you've been working on for some time may begin to go slightly sour today. Do not give up on it just yet; be prepared to change course.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Your Intuition will serve you and others well today. You should be able to keep those around you from following a dead-end path.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Make sure that you're not just spinning your wheels at this time. It is essential that your activities yield consistent results.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may need to stop and think before charging into a situation about which you know very little. Are you doing what's best for you?

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — There is no sense in repeating yourself over and over. You can gain much more ground even by trying something new and failing!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — A Scorpio or Leo native will offer a challenge that is attractive to you, but you may not be able to work out the logistics.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — You need more attention than you've been getting at this time. Do not be afraid of telling those around you what you really want.

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — You can surprise a loved one today by doing something expected in a wholly unexpected fashion. Take advantage of his or her gullibility.

Baseball pummels Hawks in sweep

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

It didn't seem right that baseball had to be played under such conditions after last weekend's sultry tease. The sound of aluminum pings echoed painfully over Earl E. Lorden Field Saturday and yesterday, as the Massachusetts baseball team swept a three-game series with St. Joseph's.

UMass (13-6, 6-0 Atlantic 10) tossed the Hawks (11-15-1) to the roadside, 11-1, 6-2, on Saturday, and 5-0 yesterday.

Jeff Puleri (3-1) pitched seven innings, fanning seven while walking three yesterday to earn the win. Travis Veracka finished up strong, striking out two including the last batter to end the game.

"We got a couple early runs," Puleri said. "I had my breaking ball and changeup working, and we all really worked together."

The Minutemen started off hot in the first when leadoff hitter Shaun Skeffington singled to center, stole second and advanced to third on Bryan Mazzaferro's sacrifice bunt back to the pitcher. Muchie Daghiere, currently enjoying an 18-game hitting streak, smacked a single to centerfield to score Skeffington. He went 5-for-10 on the weekend.

"Our clutch guys came through for us," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We were pretty solid defensively and our hitting was good."

St. Joseph's went down 1-2-3 in the first two innings as Puleri began both innings with a K. The right-hander jumped ahead on the count as the Hawks failed to reach first. It wasn't until the third inning that they recorded back- to-back base hits but failed to take advantage.

UMass scored another run in the second inning as Matt Wolcott reached second on an error and Nate Lang knocked in Aaron Braunstein, who reached on a fielder's choice. But UMass conserved until the fourth as Braunstein, Wolcott and Skeffington all touched home on just two hits as the exploding offense took advantage of the Hawks struggling defense.

Minutewomen drop one, but take three at home against conference foes

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team received a wake up call yesterday. After a less than spectacular effort, the Minutewomen dropped a 1-0 decision to Dayton, in the first half of a doubleheader. That was all the motivation UMass needed.

"We went out there kind of expecting to win," said sophomore catcher Nicole Faessler, who had a home run in the second game. "It was a wake up call, and it hurt us, but it definitely made us come back stronger."

In the nightcap UMass took over and dominated the Flyers, winning 8-0. The game was called on the mercy rule in the fifth inning.

The Minutewomen started their slugfest early, scoring two runs in the bottom of the first. Junior second base play-

Minuteman pitchers combine for impressive effort from hill

By Michael Kobylanski

Massachusetts junior hurler Ryan Cameron was unhappy with his performance in a 6-2 win over St. Joseph's in the second game of a Saturday doubleheader at Earl E. Lorden Field.

The right-hander pitched a complete game (7 innings), while allowing only two runs on four hits, striking out eight Hawk batters.

"I didn't pitch well at all today. My control was off and I walking too many guys," said Cameron, who upped his record to 3-2 with the victory. "In our system we're asked to get ahead in the count, and I wasn't doing that. I just had too many lapses out there."

Regardless of Cameron's disappointment in an outing that most pitchers would be thrilled with, the irony in all of this was that the two runs scored by St. Joe's were the most tallied by the Hawks in a game all weekend.

Yes, that's right. The most.

That is because junior southpaw Bill Cooke tossed a complete game (7 innings) five-hitter, allowing only one run in the first game of Saturday's twin-bill. Then, on Sunday, Jeff Puleri and Travis Veracka combined on a three-hit shutout to sweep the weekend set from the visiting Hawks.

"We got some real good pitching this weekend from all three starters and Travis as well. Jeff did a good job today of mixing all of his pitches and was still strong even when we took him out," said Massachusetts coach Mike Stone, whose club moves to 13-6, 6-0 in the Atlantic 10. "Bill is always solid out there, and he did a nice job. Ryan had a little trouble out there with the walks, but came back and had good stuff."

It seems like all of the attention has been on the potent UMass offense this season. However, while the offense was hot and cold at times this weekend, the pitching was always approaching the boiling point.

UMass is knocking on next level's door

John Fay does not have to hype his game with a lot of talk. What he does on the lacrosse field is proof enough of his talent.

The Duke men's lacrosse team — for which Fay currently stars — does not need the incredible media attention the Syracuses and the Marylands of the collegiate lacrosse world get. The results of the No. 5 Blue Devils produce, however, deserve that attention.

Fay and Duke's recent success go hand and hand. The senior attackman is one of the school's — not to mention the country's — best. Halfway through his final season, he ranks third all-time in the Blue Devil goals scored category with 133 tallies (he needs 23 to move into first), and among the school's top 10 point scorers.

In his four years at Duke, the Blue Devils have risen through the ranks to stake their claim as a national power. Last season's final four appearance attests to that fact. The Devils' 8-1 record attests to that fact, as does their 15-4 defeat of Massachusetts Saturday at Richard F. Garber Field.

"John Fay is one of the best attackmen around," Duke coach Mike Pressler said. "He shoots well and he has a great knack around the goal." Fay made his presence felt Saturday with four goals and two assists; Duke verified their status among the nation's best.

That level is one Pressler says the Minutemen themselves are very close to achieving.

"UMass is very close to the top level of college lacrosse," he said. "They are probably one or two players away. And Greg Cannella is the kind of coach who can get UMass to that next level."

This weekend represented this season's first major step toward reaching that level. And although the game did not give Cannella or the Minutemen the result they wanted, it did give them something that could prove more valuable as the year goes on: focus.

"Anytime you are involved in a loss like this it causes some refocusing," Cannella said.

The lesson is especially timely considering the rest of the Minutemen's 1998 slate. Next week UMass travels to Baltimore for one of the most talent laden lacrosse afternoons all season. In the first game of a doubleheader at Johns Hopkins, the Minutemen will take on Loyola at 4 p.m.; in the second game, the host Blue Jays will face Maryland at 7 p.m.

"This game was a gut check," senior goaltender John Kasselakis said. "Loyola is a heck of a club. We've got to come out ready to play against them."

UMass will also have to come ready to play against the rest of its slate. The five games the Minutemen have remaining read like a who's who of both regional rivals and national powers: the Greyhounds, Syracuse, Harvard, Brown and Notre Dame.

"I told them to think about [the game] alone and think about it as a team," Cannella said. "I told them to keep their heads up. We are 6-1 with five games left, and they're all big games. I told them 'You can't let this defeat hurt you.'"

With what UMass has accomplished this season, Saturday's game notwithstanding, the Minutemen are knocking on the same door Duke faced only a year or so ago.

They have the ingredients to make that transition to sustained national prominence. Now they have to make that step.

Next week's game could be a big part of that.

Duke bedevils lax with scoring spree

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

It was a reality check, indeed, for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team.

The Minutemen were riding high coming into Saturday's contest against No. 5 Duke. The No. 8 Minutemen were one of four undefeated teams in the country. They slowly climbed the polls, re-establishing themselves as a national power, after graduating much of last year's offensive production.

The Blue Devils certainly put the season into focus Saturday, as they ran the Minuteman defense all over the field, en route to a 15-4 demolition of UMass (6-1). The loss marks the worst home defeat since losing to Dartmouth 14-2 in 1965.

The teams battled to a standstill in the first six minutes, until Duke's Brendan Keaney caught a John Fay pass wide open in front of the goal and fired it past goalie John Kasselakis.

The floodgates opened, as Duke poured it on in the first quarter, netting four more goals before the first whistle sounded. Five different Blue Devils tallied goals in the first quarter, including Fay, who finished the day with four goals and two assists. Duke out-shot the Minutemen 12-3 in the first frame and took advantage of junior Scott Diggs's domination of the faceoff circle.

Duke opened the second period much like the first. Sophomore attackman T.J. Durnan scored his second goal of the game with an up and under move on Kasselakis.

The Minutemen finally found the back of the net when sophomore midfielder Alex Racioppi cocked and fired a bullet past Duke goaltender Craig Seyffer from the restricting line to make the score 6-1. Junior Mike McKeefrey posted his tenth goal of the season, but not before Fay struck again.

The half that the Minutemen had dominated all season, outscoring opponents, 45-14, had backfired as Duke had simply taken it to UMass.

"We hadn't been down yet in the season. In the style that we play, it's tough to come back," coach Greg Cannella said. "They have to keep their heads up. A defeat like this can't hurt you for more than a couple of days. We have to think about working hard on Monday."

In the second half, Duke waited for the perfect shot, working the ball around the perimeter before getting a clear look on Kasselakis. He was a sitting duck as the Blue Devils continued the onslaught in the third period. Racioppi's second goal on the day was sandwiched between four Duke scores to make the count 11-3 after three frames.

Duke's offense was the story as the fourth quarter, one which saw the Blue Devils extend their lead to 15-3 when Ben Quayle found paydirt. Mike DelPercio scored a late goal, but Duke had the game well in hand.

"We just got outplayed," Kasselakis said. "They came ready to play, and we came out flat. When you get buried like that, you have to dig deep."

UMass will next try to tame the No.7 Loyola on Saturday on the campus of Johns Hopkins University. The Greyhounds are hot off an 18-15 upset of No. 2 Syracuse at the Carrier Dome.

"We didn't play with enough heart today," Racioppi said. "This week, we'll find out what this team is made of."

Meiring's resignation announced yesterday

PRETORIA, South Africa (AP) — South Africa's military chief announced his resignation yesterday because of the controversy over a report about an alleged coup plot.

Gen. Georg Meiring, who did not admit any wrongdoing in a brief statement to journalists, said he was stepping down "without prejudice" and would seek his pension.

President Nelson Mandela said he had accepted the resignation "with regret" and agreed to allow Meiring to retire early. "The president would like to thank Gen. Meiring for the services he has rendered to the governments of the Republic of South Africa," Mandela said in a statement.

The military report Meiring gave to Mandela on Feb. 5 named several former anti-apartheid guerrillas who now hold top military and government posts as taking part in organized activities to destabilize the country, with the aim of toppling the government. Mandela has said he never believed the report and his government has repeatedly insisted there was no plot.

Supreme Court refuses suit against Domino's

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court yesterday refused to revive an antitrust lawsuit against Domino's Pizza Inc. by 11 franchise holders who accused it of monopolizing the $500 million-a-year market for pizza ingredients.

The justices, without comment, let stand rulings that threw out the lawsuit against the nation's second largest pizza company. Domino's sells more than $1.8 billion a year worth of pizza and other food items through a national network of 4,200 stores. Some 3,500 of those stores are owned and operated by independent franchise holders.

Each franchise holder's contract with Domino's requires that all pizza ingredients, beverages and packaging materials conform to Domino's standards.

The contract also states that Domino's may require that ingredients...used in the preparation...of pizza be purchased exclusively from Domino's or from approved suppliers or distributors. The lawsuit alleged that Domino's, which controls more than 90 percent of the market for pizza ingredients, used its market power to drive out an cooperative effort by franchise holders set up as a competing supplier.

U.S. Representative Olver makes stop in Thompson

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Staff

United States Representative John Olver spoke yesterday in Thompson Hall as part of a round table discussion sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Democrats in collaboration with the Pi Sigma Alpha Political Science Honors Society.

The discussion opened with the Chair of the University Democrats, Toby Chadhuri, who began with the statement "questions come up as to why this generation is apathetic to politics. Now it's time for us to get involved and engage the system."

Olver, who has served as the western Massachusetts representative since 1991, discussed the goals of Democrats in the upcoming congressional elections.

Recent congressional trends, Olver said, are "now the two parties have sort of separated, the distributions hardly overlap now, so this leads to confrontation. When you had the two parties with a substantial degree of overlap, there would not be much in the way of confrontation.

"Now there are major battles over ideologies on a lot of different issues. The Democratic party, of course, is trying to regain the house of representatives."

According to Olver, the Republican Party is interested in switching at least four seats in the Senate. By achieving this, the republicans would be able to get a majority vote "to cut off debate and would then be in control of filibusters completely," he said.

Specifically, Olver pointed out that democrats are putting in a strong effort to take over 11 seats in the House of Representatives.

Olver said issues Democrats are dealing with are: securing social security, reducing the age for entry into Medicare for younger workers, education infrastructure, and research and development.

"The key position that has been evolving is, it looks as if were going to end up with a sizeable surplus over the next several years after not having surplus for at least 30 years," he said.

"With that there was a new dynamic beginning to appear, the Democrats and Republicans were

Current SGA budget allots more funds to SGA than other RSOs

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Registered Student Organizations (RSO) will be left without financial support if problems arise the rest of this semester because the Finance Reserve account of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA), used to provide emergency funds for RSOs, was empty as of March 11.

RSOs will have to petition other RSOs for money or, in the case of a severe emergency, use the SGA long-term reserves in order to receive additional money this year.

"With the finance reserves empty it would have to be a real emergency, like the craft center burning down, but we do have long term reserves for that. But the best bet is to go to other RSOs. Sometimes other RSOs have extra money," Seth Avakian, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee said.

The Finance Reserve had $32,000 to use for other purposes besides giving emergency money to RSOs.

"It gives them [RSOs] more money. There are a couple different roles, one is to have emergency money for RSOs. Their main role is to fund for events that weren't planned for in their [RSO] budget," Avakian said.

Avakian felt it was too early for the finance reserve account to be empty.

"Spending that money this early in the semester is somewhat irresponsible," Avakian said.

Dan Backer, chairman of the Finance Committee, could not be reached for comment.

Money in SGA accounts comes from the Student Activities Trust Fund (SATF) which is paid for by students through the Student Activities fee included in tuition.

According to a copy of the SGA budget for fiscal year 1998, each student contributes $71.00 per year. For fiscal year 1998 that amounted to $1,194,859.

The SGA has sole responsibility to giving out the SATF money to RSOs and Agencies. This includes the SGA which is an RSO.

Student governments, including area governments, were given $159,589.

The SGA received $48,737 of that money which is more than any other RSO. The next closest RSO in funding is the Distinguished Visitors Program with $33,000.

Peter Kilbourne, speaker of the sense explains the large amount of funding.

"We have 13 or 14 people on payroll. That alone takes up about $30,000. Myself, the president and trustee each get $4,000 a year alone," Kilbourne said. The executive cabinet, which is appointed by the president, also gets paid $1500 per person per year.

Agencies receive the majority of the SATF money with 58 percent of the budget. The highest allotment to an agency is the Student Legal Services Office which is given $262,836.

All RSOs either maintained their level of funding or received an increase in funding in fiscal year 1998.

The RSO with the biggest increase was the Black Mass Communications Project with an increase of $11,000. Raising funding to $30,000.

All Agencies received more money in fiscal year 1998.

The Agency with the largest increase was the Office of ALANA Affairs adding $48,937, totaling funds to $120,677.

Israel cleared in death of bombmaker

By Imad Musa
Associated Press

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Palestinian security officials cleared Israel yesterday in the death of the chief Hamas bombmaker, saying he was shot by a rival Hamas member who tried to cover up the slaying by disfiguring the body in a bomb blast.

Hamas leaders rejected the findings. They insisted Israel was responsible for the death of Mohiyedine Sharif, and said the Hamas military wing, Izzedine al Qassam, would probably make good on its threats to carry out revenge bombings in Israel.

Sharif's death has strained ties between Hamas and Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority.

An open confrontation with Hamas would make it easier for Arafat to crack down on the militants, as demanded by Israel as a condition for a troop pullback in the West Bank.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said the investigation proved that the Palestinian Authority was capable of fighting terrorism and that it must continue its efforts.

"That, I think, would pave the way for the resumption of the peace process," Netanyahu said. But he also said he regretted that some Palestinian officials had been so quick to cast blame. Sharif's body was found at the scene of a car bomb blast in a garage in an industrial zone of the West Bank on March 29, and the circumstances of his death were unclear for days.

"I can say now that Israel is not responsible for that operation," said Palestinian Planning Minister Nabil Shaath, who several days ago had accused Israel of involvement.

A senior Palestinian security official said Monday that Sharif was killed by Adel Awadallah, a rival for leadership of Izzedine al Qassam.

On March 29, Awadallah and a teen-age bombmaker, Ghassan Addasi, drove Sharif to a remote area, said the official.

Awadallah shot and killed Sharif, packed the body in the car and then drove to Ramallah. Addasi and Awadallah rigged the car with explosives, placed Sharif's body near it and detonated the bombs with a timer, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The two apparently hoped the body would be disfigured enough to erase all signs of the shooting. However, only Sharif's right leg was torn off by the blast, the official said.

Antitrust case against Microsoft mulled

By Rob Wells
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department is considering a new antitrust case against Microsoft Corp. involving the new Windows 98 software, officials said yesterday.

Justice investigators issued a new round of civil subpoenas to major computer makers concerning Microsoft Corp., but haven't decided yet if they will file a case.

A Microsoft spokesman said the company "will work very closely" with Justice Department investigators but said the company envisions no delay in the planned May 15 release of its new Windows 98 software to PC makers. The software is scheduled for public release June 25.

"We do not believe there is any scenario that would delay the release of Windows 98 with all of the Internet capabilities included," Microsoft spokesman Mark Murray said.

A Compaq Computer Corp. spokeswoman confirmed that it recently received a civil subpoena from the Justice Department's antitrust division concerning Microsoft, but declined to provide any details. Justice investigators have subpoenaed other major computer companies and are considering bringing a case before Microsoft releases its Windows 98 program, said an official familiar with the government's case, who spoke on condition of anonymity. Windows, the dominant operating system software for personal computers, controls a PC's basic functions.

The software giant could be charged with violating the Sherman Antitrust Act by maintaining and extending its control over operating software for personal computers.

The Wall Street Journal first reported the new investigation in yesterday's editions.

Justice spokesman Michael Gordon declined to comment, citing the ongoing review of Microsoft. "We're in the middle of an open investigation," Gordon said. "It's important to point out that no decision has been made."

Murray said the company wouldn't speculate on what government investigators may or may not do with information gathered from the subpoenas.

"The issuance of new requests for information isn't surprising or significant in our view," Murray said. "We're optimistic that after they review all the facts, they'll agree that we're completely within the law and competing fairly."

Officials stepped back from earlier plans to stop the March 98 version of operating software altogether and may instead settle for forcing Microsoft to offer the new program without Microsoft's Internet Explorer software, according to the source.

The government also might seek to ease PC makers and Internet service providers from alleged exclusionary contracts, the source said.

thinking of how they wanted to use the surplus. The president decided that whatever surpluses were going to come forward were going to go into social security to secure the generation between you and me and your generation and long into the future" said Olver.

After finishing with this final statement, Olver fielded questions from students. One student asked how the democrats felt about the Republican proposal to raise the Medicare age from 65 to 67.

"We push for universal health coverage of some form. So, of course we'd be bitterly opposed to upping the age which then means there's a lot more people who don't have health insurance," he responded.

Questions ranging from how to give jobs to the unemployed to balancing the budget were asked by students attending.

"What other things can we do to bring down the costs of tuitions across the board for college educations?" asked Chadhuri.

He went on to inform students that to reduce costs in one area, funding needs to be taken from another area. For now, the focus of federal support for tuition has been with supporting financial means for minorities and economically deprived students to attend colleges and universities.

Olver responded by saying that "we have attempted to give scholarships, Pell grants, student loans, work study, and to pour them in such a way that people who have less economic means could get a bigger package of those things. The president's proposal would be to provide a substantial increase in those types of issues for those at the lowest economic end of the scale."

■ bombing

dozen suicide bombings in Israel since 1994, killing scores of people.

Addasi, along with two other Hamas members, is under arrest, but Awadallah remains at large, the official said.

Addasi's family said he was innocent. His 26-year-old brother, Isam, said Ghassan spent the evening of the killing praying at the mosque, having dinner with his family and going to bed early. The other two suspects were not identified. Ibril Rajoub, the Palestinian security chief in the West Bank, said they included people whom Sharif had trained and others who had helped hide him. Sharif, 32, topped Israel's most-wanted list as the mastermind of several suicide bombings. He had been on the run since August 1995, moving from safehouse to safehouse.

Abdel Aziz Rantisi, a leader of Hamas in the Gaza Strip, said the investigation's results are "not acceptable to Hamas." Rantisi insisted that Israel was ultimately responsible for Sharif's death.

Asked on Israel radio whether Hamas would go ahead with previously threatened revenge attacks, Rantisi said: "I believe in the way of Hamas, and that is that it will indeed react." The Palestinians also took care to fill in the Americans on their investigation. Israel's Channel One said CIA officials received a briefing in Ramallah.

In response to the Hamas threats, Israeli security forces have been on heightened alert, patrolling markets, malls and bus stations in Jerusalem and tightening controls at West Bank roadblocks.

Israel was expected to seal off the West Bank and Gaza Strip before the start Friday of the weeklong Jewish holiday of Passover to prevent possible attacks.

In Jerusalem, disturbances broke out in Arab neighborhoods after a Palestinian driver was shot to death by Israeli police after he refused to stop. Later, local residents began stoning police cars. Tires were burned and Israeli buses were stoned outside the Old City.

New images of Mars' face

PASADENA, Calif. (AP) — New images released yesterday from a NASA spacecraft orbiting Mars may resolve a debate over the purported "Face on Mars," a feature photographed more than 20 years ago that has become part of folklore.

Images of the site recorded during the weekend by the Mars Global Surveyor were released yesterday by NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory.

After data transmitted from the spacecraft was processed, NASA began posting images on a Web site at late morning.

But the first raw image of the region of Mars called Cydonia was a dark rectangle with a blotchy white patch that might or might not be the "Face" formation seen from the Viking mission to Mars in the 1970s.

Global Surveyor also attempted to photograph the two Viking lander sites and last year's Mars Pathfinder landing site. Those images were to be released later today and Tuesday, said Diane Ainsworth, a JPL spokeswoman.

The "Face" has taken on a life of its own since images of the shadowy, gape-mouthed visage were popularized.

While mainstream scientists say the image is a trick of light and shadow on natural features, believers say it may be part of an ancient city on Mars.

Several years ago, supporters of the "Face" theory went so far as to suggest that the troubled billion-dollar Mars Observer mission was disabled by NASA on purpose to avoid photographing artificial structures on the Red Planet.

NASA lost contact with the Observer spacecraft as it was approaching Mars. Mission officials said the sabotage suggestion was preposterous.

"There've been charges of conspiracy and manipulating the data and we want to make it very clear to everybody that no such activity goes on here," said Glenn E. Cunningham, project manager. "We put the raw data out there so that anybody can take the raw data and process it any way they want."

The space agency recently announced that by chance it had an opportunity to photograph the Cydonia region and other features of public interest because of a change in plans for the Global Surveyor mission. The change was made necessary by a technical problem involving one of the spacecraft's solar panels.

Military sees rise in gay dismissals

By Susanne M. Schafer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — More people are opting out of the military by declaring they are homosexual, Defense Secretary William Cohen said yesterday, but he denied that there has been any increase in sexual harassment.

Cohen insisted the military's policy on homosexuals is working properly.

"We intend to continue to emphasize the fact that this policy should not be abused, that there should be no attempt to hunt or seek out those who are — may be — homosexual, and that we intend to strictly enforce the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy," Cohen said, appearing at a photo session in the Pentagon.

The secretary was asked about a Pentagon study of the issue, which is now in a draft form and has not been made public. "There are some indications that there has been an increase as far as some of the people who have declared themselves to be homosexual and have opted to getting out of the military," Cohen said. "But in terms of the policy itself overall, I think it's working."

He did not elaborate.

However, the number of people who have either left or been kicked out of the service on grounds of homosexuality rose from 850 in 1996 to nearly 1,000 in 1997, according to a Pentagon official familiar with the study. The official, like Cohen, declined to say how many of those voluntarily said they were homosexuals so that they would be discharged.

A second official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity, said a variety of reasons appears to explain the increase. He said it appears many of those who are volunteering to disclose their homosexuality do so shortly after entering the service. Some officers speculate that homosexuality may be used as an excuse by people who are unhappy with being in the military.

Those dismissed for homosexuality receive an administrative discharge, which does not carry a bad-conduct stigma.

The 'don't ask, don't tell' policy, adopted soon after President Clinton entered office, is supposed to allow gays to serve if they keep their sexual orientation private, but it punishes those who engage in homosexual acts or take actions that call attention to their orientation.

Commanders are not to ask about sexual orientation or launch investigations without credible evidence.

But critics of the Pentagon's approach say they believe that harassment of homosexuals is on the increase.

"We think they are not following their own rules," said Dixon Osburn, the co-executive director of the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, a gay rights advocacy group. "We think there is a huge amount of harassment going on. Commanders are asking questions they are not supposed to be asking."

Osburn said the number of service members who were kicked out of the military on grounds of homosexuality steadily increased from 597 in 1994, to 722 in 1995 and 850 in 1996.

In its annual report released in February, the group said service members reported 563 "command violations" in 1997, including instances where they said they were asked about their sexual orientation or harassed in direct violation of the administration's policy.

Get out and vote

Another Amherst town election is upon us, complete with another opportunity to prove Select Board member Hill Boss and other town residents who feel that kegs of beer really are the only things that will get us to the polls right or wrong.

This past semester, only four people voted out of 150 eligible voters in the polling place located in Southwest. The proposed parking garage had been placed on the ballot as a referendum vote and had the potential to affect a lot of students, yet hardly any voiced their opinion on the issue by casting a ballot.

This time around, there are three UMass students running for office. Town Meeting candidates Jolyon Yates and James Eltringham are on the ballot for Town Meeting seats and Jason Vecchio has launched a major write-in campaign for a position on the Select Board.

> "We will have the opportunity to prove to Amherst residents that we are interested in investing more into the community than an occasional keg party."
> Victoria Groves

This campus has historically been very active about issues concerning minority enrollment at the University and childcare. Yet, under five percent of the eligible campus population turned out to vote in the last election, even though the polling place is right on campus. We seem to like the sound of our own voices chanting as we march outside Goodell and Whitmore, yet when presented with the opportunity to impact town politics for the good of our fellow students, we fall disappointingly short.

Unfortunately, Vecchio's name will not be appearing on the ballot today, so he's facing an uphill battle, counting on volunteers to pass out stickers with his name on them at the polls and voters to apply them to the ballots. Logically, he should sweep the student vote. Since there isn't one, his potential success may be marred by apathy. Judging from the past, he will have to count more on townspeople than fellow students to have faith in him as a politician.

Relations have never been amicable between the town and the student population, but students truly are the backbone of the community. We keep the economy healthy. Unfortunately, what gets noticed is the "Save Our Beer" rally that makes us look like we will organize for only the most trivial of causes. With students on the Select Board and also as members of Town Meeting, not only will we have someone representing us on issues that we otherwise might be unaware of, but we will also have the opportunity to prove to Amherst residents that we are interested in investing more into the community than an occasional keg party.

Vecchio's campaign fundraisers consist of members of both the Amherst and University community. As a student legislator in the past, he was able to raise enough money in three weeks to run a professional campaign, with legitimate sponsors to back him up.

Rallies, marches and chalk slogans written on Herter Hall can show the administration that we are unhappy with the state of UMass. But there are issues in town that affect us just as much, the possible extension of the alcohol policy to off campus being one example. The only way our voices will be heard is if we show up and vote for those who are running to represent us. Otherwise, we can't complain.

Cartoon wars

Although my existence may be mundane in my opinion, I live out every child's fantasy with my college life. I can eat pizza for every meal, go to bed whenever I please, throw water balloons, have a food fight, wear my pajamas all day, and at the end of all that I can kick back and watch cartoons.

Alexis Pushkar

The cartoon "South Park" is aimed at people my age — late teens and early 20s. Anyone more than a decade older or younger doesn't get it. People who are between 18 and 24 are the perfect age for "South Park": young enough to still act like kids and old enough to understand the points that the show makes about our society. For example, Christmas really is a battle between Jesus and Santa Claus, or rather, religion and capitalism. However, the symbolic way this idea was depicted on the show — with Jesus and Santa Claus beating each other up and swearing — offends some people both inside and outside the age bracket.

> "Cartoons are minor compared with what kids imbibe from the rest of the culture."

Why do we like that show and why do we like cartoons in general? Do cartoons distort our perceptions of reality and cause violence?

"South Park," like other cartoons, is the ultimate fantasy world where nothing is real and everything is actually quite distorted. On the show, death is meaningless, and absolutely everyone from Jesus to genetic engineers is the target of ridicule. The children are dwarves with no elbows, and they only wear winter jackets and hats no matter what the season, no matter whether they are inside or out. Characters spontaneously burst into songs with objectionable lyrics, monkeys have four butts, turkeys are demented, excrement happens to come alive, gay animals have their own amusement park, babies heads aren't attached to their jaws, and there is a monster in the mountains that has celery for an arm and Patrick Duffey for a leg.

"South Park" both mocks cartoons and condones them. However, the subtlety of the mockery may be lost on five percent of the show's viewing audience: people 11 and under.

Kids love cartoons, and most can separate fantasy and reality. Many of them are aware that rabbits can't run into a cement wall at 90 miles an hour and live to tell about it, but the unreality of it all is what they find funny.

Cartoons are an escape from reality into an intense fantasy world where there may not even be any people. The setting is nowhere in particular. The weather is only important if it figures into the plot. Time is meaningless. The laws of physics and biology do not apply. No one important can ever die. Most importantly, in many popular cartoons like "Bugs Bunny" and the "Smurfs," there are no parents.

Do these unrealistic fantasy worlds confuse children and contribute to something like the murders in Jonesboro, Ark.?

Usually the causes of childhood violence are attributed to a variety of stressful circumstances acting upon a disturbed psyche. Divorces, abuse and bullies create stress in a child's world which is filled with visions from an intense imagination and a feeling of helplessness. Cartoons may influence an already disturbed individual, but they cannot cause a child to commit a murder if the child is otherwise happy and well-cared for.

Cartoons are just another part of the fantasy world that kids inhabit, and they understand the difference between the world they inhabit with each other and the world the adults inhabit.

Some adults remember better than others how their childhood was. Trey Parker and Matt Stone, the creators of South Park, remember very well the confusion and excitement of being a kid. They mixed that with their adult desires to say and do the most outrageous things in an attempt to be funny. The result is a fantasy world that reminds us of reality, but is not really grounded in reality.

I watch "South Park" to escape the reality of my life for half an hour. My younger cousins dream about my life to escape theirs. Cartoons give us a way to escape into another world, a little like the world we escaped into as children. The only caveat is to remember what is real and what could never be real.

It's easy for parents to say that cartoons influence kids by making them more aggressive and violent. What parents fail to think about is their own behavior when they are stressed while driving, when they come home from work, and when they have to wait in line at the bank. Adults are nastier and more aggressive in public. They see more violent movies and exhibit more open tension in their homes.

Cartoons are minor compared with what kids imbibe from the rest of the culture. The reason why kids can keep cartoons in perspective is because they are just drawings on a screen without any resemblance to reality at all. Kids intuitively know that if they are going to jump off a roof, they aren't going to squish down like an accordion and then pop back up. They also have a sense of mortality — their own and others.

"South Park" and other cartoons are not the problem. They only reflect what is in the rest of the culture. The problem is the reality of our culture, what kids see and hear adults doing, and what adults don't see and hear kids doing.

There's a "South Park" episode where parents catapult themselves into the side of a building to save their children from the "Terence and Philip" show, mocking parents who advocate censorship. "Terence and Philip" are still on the air on the show, which means that the kids won. Kids are, after all, smarter than we think.

U.S. interests in Africa

Yes, it's true; Clinton was in Africa last week. The President of the United States of America. The President of the ultimate capitalist economy of the world made a visit to Africa. If this were an ideal world, then this would undoubtedly be a good thing. What we need to focus on is not that Clinton was in Africa, but what he was doing there and what he had hoped to achieve by the end of his visit.

There have been suggestions about trade: about promoting democratic rule and about enforcing integration on a global scale. Without imposing my opinions on any readers, I will simply say this: There is a reason that Clinton visited only a handful of countries and it wasn't because there were just too many for him to get through. It was because he was not welcome in those other countries. The fact remains that the stringent militant rule, which was a norm during the days of colonialism as a means to control the creation of mass rebellions by the population, have perpetuated themselves in countries throughout the continent today. Other countries, in their plight to achieve ultimate "independence" have made conscious efforts to reject anything that even vaguely symbolizes "Western ways."

> "Trade is not synonymous with equity or fairness."
> Malika Tafawa

Think about it: If the United States initiates trade relations with a continent that has systematically been excluded for nearly half a century, it is not because someone woke up and decided that it would be mutually beneficial to engage in trade with Africa. It is because the Korean, Mexican, Indonesian and Filipino workforce is exhausted. It is because the U.S. empire is ready for a new wave of expansion in its plight for eventual world domination. It is because a new source of low wage labor is waiting to be tapped into. Taking the perspective of the United States and its sudden interest and subsequent pursuit of African involvement in the world economy on a significant level, "Unless I know that I have more to gain from it [trade] than the other party involved, I will readily do without it."

As long as U.S. government officials retain good relations with local and national African leaders by pampering their wallets and Swiss bank accounts, then the suppression of the majority of the population will occur with ease and at the hands of their own people. Trade is not synonymous with equity or fairness. If it is supposed to end or reduce unemployment, why don't we take a step back and consider why there is large-scale unemployment in the first place. If economic structures within formerly colonized African countries were not geared toward industrialization and the fueling of the Western machine of capital accumulation at all costs, then the pull factors away from rural areas and to commercial cities within the continent would be non- existent. It is these urban dwellers who account for the unemployment we speak of.

It is a fact that countries which were coerced into monoeconomies suffer when demand patterns on the world markets change. For you economics majors, here lies the concept of inelastic demand for subsistence agricultural products, which affects African, Latin American and Asian countries, due to the development of substitutes and technological advances in the economies of potential consumers.

President Clinton's tour will open many economic opportunities... Yes, but for Nike, Victoria's Secret and other corporations who will be provided with new locations for their sweat shops. Is this really something to be appreciative about?

If anything, I am afraid of the implications of Clinton's visit to Africa. Afraid of what I think will inevitably result. Perhaps it is believed that our people have forgotten about the nature of the last time that "trade" was conducted with the continent on a large scale. It arrived with the "discovery" of Africa, so how can one assume that the idea of a rediscovery of Africa is anything worth looking forward to? Perhaps we need to take a stand and remind ourselves of colonialism and its overwhelming legacy. Perhaps we need to take a stand as individuals and as a group for our people back home... Perhaps we just need to take a stand.

To the editor:

This letter is in response to Jen Giroux's letter to the editor (4/6).

Yes, it does seem that Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) are totally ignored and do not get the coverage that we should in our school newspaper. However, we can change all this if we work together! Imagine what could be accomplished if all the student groups on this campus worked together.

Many of you may not know this, but we now have a programming board. It is still in its early stages of development, but its goal is to be a terrific resource to student groups. The function of it would be to advocate for RSOs, create an accessible calendar of events, create community among the student groups, provide workshops, and in general be a resource to the RSOs. People from student groups would actually make up the board.

We've been having meetings for over a month now, and only a handful of groups have shown up. This is your opportunity to have a say in the formation of this resource. If you haven't heard about it till now, don't fret! This Sunday at 1:00 p.m. in the Campus Center (room tba) there will be a meeting for it.

So if you want to find out what other RSOs can offer you, then come to the meeting!

Four daytime stars booted

In a bit of shocking news this week, four of daytime's finest, or not, have been given the boot from their respective soaps. The most mind boggling of the four has to be "Another World's" decision to let Charles Keating (Carl) go. Granted, I'm still bitter about the fact that he stole the Emmy from Maurice Benard (Sonny, "General Hospital") a few years back but I've always enjoyed the character. He's always been that bad boy trying desperately to be good and those are, ultimately, the more interesting characters on daytime. This is only one of many changes the show has made since Richard Culliton (who's doing a marvelous job despite his faux pas with "GH" a year ago) and Co.'s arrival (I believe they call it an overhaul). It'll be interesting to see how the fans react to this one, especially with the old school fans still grumbling about Kale Brownes (Michael) departure from the soap.

COURTESY JACOB SANDERS

Lisa Peluso of "Another World" donating her time to the Make a Wish Foundation

The other three dismissals concern Barbara Crampton (Maggie, "Bold and the Beautiful"), Steve Wilder and Stephanie Cameron (Jack and Jenn, "Days of Our Lives"). I'm sad to hear about Barbara's departure only because she's one of the few things the show had going for it. Everyone else on "B&B" seems so blase and boring. It's crucial that every soap have at least one vixen and since Sheila's maternal act, she's been it. Today we mourn the passing of one of daytime's bitches. I'd like a moment of silence please...

The other shocking departures, as I mentioned above, are Steve and Stephanie's departure from "Days" as the infamous Jack and Jenn (a cursed role if I've ever seen one). In all honesty, I could care less about the two of these clowns (no pun intended) although Jenn had started to grow on me, the key word being "started." The new Jack just didn't do it for me and the two of them lacked that special something (the cheesy dialogue didn't help matters). It's just so strange imagining life without Jack and Jenn. I mean, they've been on the canvas for years and they're such a huge couple. Expect the two of them to leave on a happy note sometime in May, most likely during May sweeps. Speaking of "Days"...

I have to admit, I'm excited about the upcoming Maison Blanche reveal and its connection to Hope. For the past few months the show has been teasing us, throwing us the occasional hint here and there. Expect the secret to blow sky high this spring, slash summer... as Hope and John set out to find out what happened to Hope after her amnesia). From what I've heard so far, it promises to be hot. All I have to say is, if it turns out that Hope is really Gina and that the real Hope is locked up in some back room, executive producer Tom Langan, better be prepared to deal with my wrath. Let's hope that this story gives the extremely talented Louise Sorel (Vivian) something she can really sink her teeth into. The woman is long overdue for a piece of the pie.

Here's a little synopsis of some of the more interesting soaps this week that includes my opinion and a bit of info about the week's shows.

• "All My Children". Mike Roy has made his way back to Pine Valley which will, hopefully, spice up this already tepid affair between Jack and Erica. Poor Jack, this guy's always on the losing end when it comes to romance. Unfortunately, it looks like he might be stealing a page from "lurker girl's" book and spending the better half of this month looming in the shadows. Look for Gillian to tie the knot with... oops, what fun would that be. You'll have to watch for yourself. All I can say is, all is not as it may seem.

• "Young and the Restless": Phyllis and Michael need to return to the foreground again. These two are my fave couple and yet they've been reduced to supporting roles over the last few weeks. My friend, Randi would once again like to stress that she thinks Tricia is a bimbo (that's the edited version). Can't say I don't agree with her! Look for Victor to make the ultimate sacrifice for Nikki (how very Marlena-ish). Will poor Diana be left out in the cold, yet again? It's okay, I'm sure Jack would be more than happy to console her in her time of need.

• "Days" Laura is arrested for Kristin's murder, thanks to the divine intervention of her good pal, Marlena. With friends like these... Things are coming to a head my friends and these next few weeks are must see "Days." Eileen's last airdate is later on this month.

• The other must see soap this week, big surprise, is "General Hospital," which is really heating up. Last Friday, the assassination attempt on Jax kicked into high gear and someone was hit in the cross-fire. Who, you ask? You'll just have to find out for yourself. I loved every minute of the Carly/Brenda confrontation, expect her to get in Robin's face this week. She's such a witch. I love it! By the end of the week, Carly will have Jason right where she wants him. Will her plan to seduce him work? On a sidenote, let's pick up the pace with this Robin and Nik romance. She's been in the hospital for a week now and Nik hasn't dropped by once. Nik's long overdue for a little somethin, something (borrowed from my good pals Dave and Josef) and we're long overdue for a sweet romance (now that S&B are history).

• "Port Charles": Daytime's baby Dave and Josef and we're long overdue for a sweet romance (now that S&B are history).

"Lost" in cliches, stupid ideas

LOST IN SPACE
Directed by Stephen Hopkins with Matt LeBlanc, William Hurt, Gary Oldman
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

The producers of Lost in Space obviously forgot the two rules of movie marketing when making their video garnish, action-figure mess that makes SpiceWorld look like Citizen Kane. First, never title your movie with words like "lost," as it invites newspapers to play with headlines. Second, never base your movie on a TV show that sucked to begin with.

But good judgement was obviously not on the minds of the geniuses behind Lost in Space, who spent $90 million creating cheesy special effects and hired Matt LeBlanc for the starring role, who's only way of acting is smirking, and who's previous movie outing was Ed, seen by approximately two to three people and a couple of envious primates.

The film begins with a gargantuan, scoping space battle. Wow. Every single shot is straight out of Star Wars. There we're introduced to the Robinson family, coming straight from the "Acme Book of Cliches" — like the "Dad Who's Always Busy" (William Hurt), the "Loving, All-Knowing Wife" (Mimi Rogers), and the "Brilliant Computer Kid Who Is Neglected".

The Robinsons are making a trip out to deep space to do, well, something. I wasn't paying attention, but it doesn't matter because it could have been anything. The real point is to get everyone lost, which happens when LeBlanc's Harrison Ford–for–hire captain pilots the ship into the sun, and then into some sort of wormhole. Just for the record, this is the 1,374 film to use to the wormhole idea in just a year alone.

The mission was sabotaged by Gary Oldman, who forgot he was making a B–movie and recites lines like its a Greek tragedy. Oldman will eventually turn into a giant spider creature — reason enough to get up and leave the theater.

There's a lot of talk about time warps and space holes, but it's all lost in the chaos of the special effects, which at times are quite visually impressive but stolen from just about every science fiction movie ever made, namely those by George Lucas and Star Trek.

Lost in Space also observes some other rules of the genre:

1. Always have the characters get frozen in "space pods," 'cause it was really cool in Aliens.

2. Always have slimy creatures lurking in the halls of the ship, 'cause it was really cool in Aliens. In this case, creepy space spiders!

3. Always defy normal rules of science. If you're ever hurdling towards the sun, don't panic, just go through it! This also applies to planets.

Director Stephen Hopkins is an obvious admirer of Lucas and Steven Spielberg, but he's about as talented as the thirteen year olds who enjoy this movie. Directing every scene like an action sequence, Hopkins gives the film a video–game feel, complete with metallic production design and characters who speak every sentence in monotonic, witty space jargon.

Hopkins also likes to get cute. Lacey Chabert, managing to be even more annoying than in her role in "Party of Five," is a misunderstood teen who tells us all our feelings in a little digital diary called "Penny Vision." We also get lessons on constellations, friendship, and father-hood. Barney couldn't have done it better.

Somehow, perhaps because the material is so poor, some performances actually hold up. The best of these comes from Heather Graham, an up and coming actress from Boogie Nights, playing the Robinson's oldest daughter. Her biting sarcasm and smart look are timed perfectly — somehow, she transcends a screenplay which gives her lines like, in response to LeBlanc's come–ons, "why don't you hold on to your joystick."

Who is to blame for all this? I nominate screenwriter Akiva Goldman for the amazing number of cliches and stupid ideas. What's the motivation for the Robinson family to explore a strange, holographic world? In Star Trek, it was to examine human nature; in Lost in Space, it's so the producers can introduce a cute, cuddly monkey creature to go in McDonald's happy meals.

I also nominate Goldsman because he wrote Batman and Robin, which may explain why the characters all wear super–muscle suits. And just when he couldn't make anything worse, he sets up a sequel. Giving Lost in Space a failing grade is being generous. F

Local talent: Springfield's own Ugli Kids

Adam Dlugacz

I have to start this week's column with an apology to my legions of readers. As you can probably tell, the new Tribe Called Quest did not come out last week. I'm assuming that it's coming out today so that it doesn't coincide with the Gang Starr release, but don't hold me to it.

First up on "Da Block" is Springfield's own Ugli Kids with their two song single. Representing the underground hip–hop in Western Mass., I never knew we had such skilled artists in our own backyard. The EP kicks off with "On Da Block" a song brimming over with caffeinated rhymes and sinister beats. The song employs a dangerous line by using the popular refrain "Ain't no party like an Ugli Kid party," and "Don't stop hip–hop." By using those lines the Kids have the advantage of a chorus that is guaranteed like Michael Jordan scoring fifty in the Garden. On the other hand if you are going to have a catchy song you better have the skills to back it up, and they do. There were more than a couple of times on this tape where I had to rewind and listen to the verbs and nouns laced together in killer dart

The B-side of this EP is "Study Hard" featuring Luv. "Study Hard" is like a meaner version of the message, that most of you missed I'd like to add, on De La Soul's Stakes Is High. Promoting the message that if you remain dedicated to yourself, believe in your skills, and more importantly read you can succeed in the rap game. By the way those are the first three commandments on how to succeed in the underground hip-hop game. The beats remain hard and remind me of a cross between Premier and the RZA's tracks.

Finally the Ugli Kids have done it right, by doing a self- promoted tour across the country and selling their tapes out of the trunk of their car. As Guru so eloquently put it "The right way is not always the fast way, and the fast way is not always the best way." The Kids have put in work and deserve your support.

Next to bat we have DJ Lazy K with Butta Mixin Rican Pt 3. I think it was about two or three years ago when I first heard the name Lazy K. I was in Fat Beats and while looking through the crates of tapes searching for the new Funk Master Flex tape and the new MC Search single, I was asked if I heard of Lazy K because she just won the Uptown DJ competition. Needless to say I picked up the tape with quickness and wore out the contributions of the new DJ from New Jerusalem.

So now she's got her third tape out and she's still got more ability then most of her more testosterone influenced compatriots. While there is no doubt that she can cut and mix (that thing DJs do), it's the freestyles and wore out the contributions of on this tape that really get you open. Musolini, Maze, Baby Sah, Kaeson, La The Dark Man, Fifty Cent, and Royal Flush. There's also some high rollers like Old Dirty Bastard and Das EFX mixing it up with the younger cats. The real gems come courtesy of Half a Mil, Prortorok, Phil Blunts, and Nigro League. You also get exclusive cuts like Big Pun with "Dream Shattered" and "Method Man" the Evil Streets remix as well as "A Million & One Questions" by Jay Z as the exclusive Primo remix.

It seems that everyone in the game wants to help out Lazy K and as long as she maintains her ability to get jiggy on the tables and to promote younger underground acts who can blame them. If all the highrollers are trying to get on her tape, shouldn't you at least purchase it?

Peace.

has been really good lately, especially with this "General Homicide" storyline. If you have some free time between 12:30–1 p.m., I'd suggest checking this beauty out. Lucy's theatrics alone are worth the price of admission. This week Frank's life hangs in the balance (thanks to Lark's attempted suicide jump). Things look really bad!

• "Sunset Beach" In case you haven't been getting your daily dose of "SB," the "Terror Island" killer isn't Ben, as most had suspected; but Ben's evil twin. How very original. Look for Meg's life to be in danger once again (denial is a heavy burden) this week.

Sink or Swim:

There's only one this week and it's a mix of both. It's in regards to "GH's" 35th anniversary, prime-time special. It was such a lovely trip down memory lane and so much fun to see Lois, Sonny, Anna, Duke, you name it, back in their old digs. The scenes involving BJ and Stone almost had me in tears and the Q.'s had me in hysterics. My only complaint was that the tribute was too short. Thirty-five years of history is too much for an hour show.

Baseball looks to avenge UConn loss

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Round two of the border war between the University of Massachusetts and the University of Connecticut will take place this afternoon at 3 p.m. at Earl E. Lorden Field. The Minutemen are 8-1 since returning to the friendly confines of New England, their only blemish coming at the hands of the Huskies on March 31. UMass lost 11–3, and had problems on the mound and in clutch situations at the plate.

But the Minutemen (13–6, 6–0 in Atlantic 10) are coming off a weekend sweep of St. Joseph's, and received outstanding efforts from their pitching staff all weekend. The UMass offense continues to pound out runs to the tune of almost 10 per contest, and with the intensity that this rivalry traditionally brings, this afternoon's game has all the potential signs of a classic.

"They (UConn) beat us up pretty bad last time. We have to play better this time out," Massachusetts coach Mike Stone said. "We have to get better pitching from the start, which is something we didn't have in the last game."

About the only bright spots from the earlier meeting was the fact that senior second baseman Muchie Dagliere went 3-for-5, and that the offense mustered 12 hits off the Huskies pitching. Still, UMass couldn't come through with the timely hits, and left 10 men on base. That will be something which the Minutemen can't afford to do again this time out against a quality Connecticut squad.

"They got the timely hits and we didn't," Stone said. "We got a lot of hits, but not in the key situations."

As far as pitching, the Minutemen will send either southpaw Travis Veracka or freshman Nick Skirkanich to the mound today. Veracka hurled two shutout innings in Sunday's win over the Hawks, while Skirkanich last pitched against Siena on April 1 in a rain-shortened three inning affair.

Offensively, Dagliere continues to be on fire at the plate. He went 5-for-10 with five RBI over the weekend, and leads the team in batting average (.493) and RBI (30). Shaun Skeffington and Doug Clark also had a productive series against St. Joseph's, and should provide some problems for the Huskies.

On the UConn (10–9, 2–4 in Big East) side of things, sophomore third baseman Brian Packin leads the team with a .437 average. Alejandro Rodriguez, Jason Edgar, Glenn Katz and Billy Rich are all offensive threats. Each had two hits in the first meeting. Junior southpaw Josh Santos, sophomore Scott Berney, and Pete Smith are UConn's three top starters. Berney went eight innings to record the win in game one of this couplet. The Huskies are coming off a weekend which saw them take two of three from the Hoyas of Georgetown.

McKie stays put; will return to USC for 98–99 season

COLUMBIA, S.C. (AP) — BJ McKie, the Southeastern Conference's leading scorer, will return for his senior season at South Carolina rather than declare early for the NBA draft.

McKie announced his decision yesterday, nearly four weeks after the Gamecocks were eliminated in the first round of the NCAA tournament for the second consecutive year.

"I have decided to stay at South Carolina and I look forward to getting my degree," said McKie, who is on track to become the school's all-time leading scorer next season.

McKie averaged 18.8 points per game as South Carolina went 23-8 this past season, its second consecutive 20-win campaign. That included a 24-point outing in the Gamecocks' 62-61 loss to Richmond in the first round of the East Regional at Washington.

The 6-foot-2 guard acknowledged after that game that he would take some time to explore his draft status.

South Carolina coach Eddie Fogler also spoke with some NBA scouts on McKie's behalf.

"I respect the decision BJ and the McKie family have made," Fogler said.

"BJ has played a big role in our success over the last three years and we look forward to having him back for his senior season."

against BC. Lyndsay Crenshaw and Claudia Clement also scored five each in the morning session. Other major contributions of the morning came from Katie Grogan who chipped in with four goals, and also from Erin Hillier who netted three goals of her own.

"We have been working on different offensive plays in practice and their working out in game situations," said McOsker.

Despite this offensive attack being so potent in the first two games, the real story was the defense and goal tending.

In the afternoon, UMass was unable to keep the teams completely off the scoreboard, but it didn't matter because the offense maintained the potent attack in the third and fourth games.

Grogan added six goals to her total for the day in the second session. Andrea Velazquez, Barbara Hickey and Hupp each netted four goals in the afternoon session. Meantime, Crenshaw added to her already stellar morning performance by scoring three more goals against MIT. Sophomore Laurie Edwards also had a solid day. She scored five goals, two of them in the finale, against MIT.

Defensively everybody contributed, but goalie Peggy Nieves walks away from the journey with four wins, 23 saves and two shutouts. Velazquez also got some time in net against BU. She made two saves in the relief effort.

"The defense remains the biggest part of our game, and when all seven players in the pool are giving it their all, the defense works well, and they have been doing their job," said McOsker about the defense performance of his team.

Now, the Minutewomen prepare for their only home tournament on Saturday, which consists of the second half of the home and home with Harvard. The Harvard game remains the match to watch.

Women's tennis improves to 10–9; Seton Hall is next

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

For the Massachusetts women's tennis team, this past weekend was one for the books.

The Minutewomen expected to defeat the three Atlantic 10 opponents they faced at Fordham, but they did not expect they would capture all 21 matches they would play.

UMass however, did accomplish this rare feat, in knocking off Fordham, LaSalle, and Rhode Island by identical tallies of 7-0.

"Obviously, this is a milestone for the program," Massachusetts coach Judy Dixon said.

"We felt we were better than those teams coming in, but you always figure on losing a few matches any time you compete in a weekend set."

Impressively, the Minutewomen have lifted their overall record to above .500 at 10-9. They stand at 4-4 for the spring season, which has included many stellar opponents.

This was a feel-good weekend for the Minutewomen, as everybody got a chance to play and contribute to the victories.

"We needed this to happen as a confidence booster," Dixon said. "The team was a bit down, since they had struggled against the tougher competition this season."

Ola Gerasimova led the was at No. 1 singles in the Fordham and URI matches while sitting out the LaSalle engagement.

Gerasimova pounded Nine Fiore of Fordham 6- 3, 6-2, and triumphed over Maria Pasuale of URI 6-1, 6-4.

Jackie Braunstein picked up two victories at No. 2 singles. She blanked Stacy Muelenberg of URI 6-0, 6-0, after beating Jill Evanko of LaSalle 6-1, 6-2. Marie Christine Caron, the usual No. 2 singles player, was superb at No. 1 singles against LaSalle in beating Camille Khan 6-4, 2-6, 6- 3. Robyn Lebovitz, Lana Gorodetskaya, and Emily Wegner all picked up three straight set victories in singles.

"I am very proud of this team," Dixon said. "A few years ago, we were in the middle of the pack In the A-10. Now we are clearly superior to a good portion of the teams."

UMass will now have to switch gears as they take on Seton Hall in South Orange, New Jersey this afternoon.

The Minutewomen were given the day off yesterday to recuperate from playing three successive matches in Fordham.

"The team needs to mentally prepare for this one," Dixon said. "To push them physically right now would be a mistake. The tournament is coming up and they need stamina."

Seton Hall will pose a greater challenge than they faced this weekend, as they have an established nationally ranked program. UMass fell to Seton Hall in their only previous meeting in 1995.

essence as on the uneven bars. Freshman Mary Moore hit her face on one of the bars, forcing the Minutewomen to take Anita Sanyal's 8.700. She and coach Dave Kuzara rushed to the hospital, while the Minutewomen tried to march on. But by that time, the cumulative 45.900 on the bars had all but knocked out UMass. Junior transfer Jennifer Pokrana was the highest finisher on bars, placing 13th. Other than Pokrana, no Minutewomen finished higher than 28th on the event.

"It was an awful looking fall," Kuzara said. "When something like that happens, it's going to shake you up."

Mosby came back strong and took the beam event following Moore's fall. Sanyal ranked ninth on beam, registering a 9.700.

The meet marked the grand finale of two storied careers at UMass. Seniors LeBeau and Karen Maurer represented the Minutewomen one final time. The twosome was coach Dave Kuzara's first recruiting class at UMass.

The Minutewomen conclude their season with a 9–5 record, second in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

"Disappointing is not a good word to describe the year," Kuzara said. "This year, we concentrated on raising our level of difficulty. What cost us a trip to Nationals was consistency."

Next year, women's gymnastics will try to move even closer to the limelight when they bring in three highly- touted freshmen.

"We're going to have a large senior class to help the freshmen adjust," Kuzara said. "I expect Jill and Mandy to approach the All-American level because they are really capable of doing that. We had good depth this year, and the freshmen will help us on bars and all-around."

Crew falls to Virginia

By Aaron M. Saykin
Collegian Staff

Under most circumstances, if six of seven crew boats lose their races, it would be considered a demolishing defeat; however, in the case of the Massachusetts women's crew team, its loss to the University of Virginia last Saturday has been considered a foundation for success rather than the staging for collapse.

Despite failing to win all but one of their races, the Minutewomen performed gallantly against a nationally acclaimed Cavalier team, which has enjoyed the luxury of significantly more practice time from the warmer weather.

"Looking back at this weekend, we learned a lot," said senior captain and varsity eighth rower Jen Strong. "It's so early in the season for us, and there's parts of our race that we need to improve upon. If we had more time to practice, I think that we'd be able to take them."

As one of the top-ranked crews in the Northeast, the UMass varsity eighth nearly stunned Virginia's top boat, finishing a mere four tenths of a second behind their opponents. The Cavaliers, who are ranked among the top five teams in the nation, also narrowly inched the Minutewomen's second varsity four boat by five and a half seconds. The lone victorious UMass rowers comprised the lightweight eighth boat, whose triumph uplifted the team and its coaches after a string of defeats.

"They rowed a really great race," Strong said of her teammates. "That was pretty good news after seeing some of the other finishes."

Although the Minutewomen may have been unfairly hindered by a well-prepared Virginia squad, UMass spirits remain high after the defeat, as its rowers eagerly await another showdown with the Cavaliers during the NCAA Championships.

"Coach (Jim) Dietz and the rest of the team were really excited after the race," Strong said. "The fact that this early in the season we could keep up with Virginia, a very fast crew, is encouraging. We'll be ready to get another crack at them later on in the season."

The Minutewomen will next race this Saturday in Boston against host Northeastern and Columbia.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You can't get something for nothing today but if you work hard and don't back down, you can arrange quite a bargain for yourself.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may be more interested at this time in the financial prospects you are facing than in any possibilities for personal enrichment.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — If you don't pay attention to that special someone when it is asked of you, you may not get a second chance today. Be generous with your time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You have a theatrical streak that will have a chance to shine today, but you must take care that you're not overreacting to routine events.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You are not in the mood to accept any handouts today, but by day's end you'll realize that you should have accepted one particular offer.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You are not one for the in-between approach today! You are in the mood to go for broke, but take care that you aren't risking anyone else's resources.

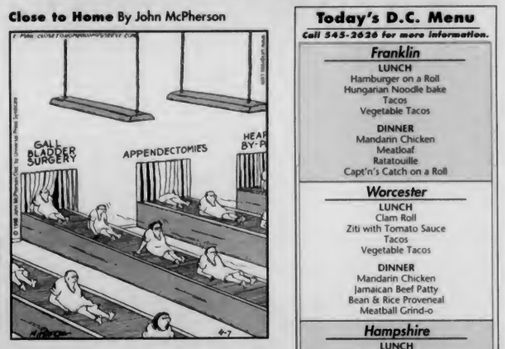
LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may have to turn to someone else for something that you are used to supplying yourself. This need should only be temporary.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You will have a chance to share your views in a manner to which you are not altogether accustomed, but you can rise to the occasion for sure.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may impress others being very much together today, but inside you're flirting with insecurity that may threaten to hold you back.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — It is time to set aside any methods that are not proving effective these days. Perhaps you should try what works for others.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — Now is no time to shirk your duties. You will be responsible for more than expected, so you must focus on changing circumstances.



PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — You may have trouble regaining your balance after someone unexpectedly knocks you off your plate early in the day. All is well by nightfall.

Quote of the Day

"It is like this with everything man undertakes. What democracy does not eventually turn into tyranny, what faith does not breed intolerance, what disinterested search for truth does not culminate in the rigidity of a system?"

–G. I. Gurdjieff

Jordan strong as playoffs near

Michael. Can we ever get enough of MJ? Most basketball fans would say they could never become satisfied with greatness. I'd have to agree. His Airness simply knows how to get it done. Last week was no exception, as Jordan capped off a busy one by being named NBA Player of the Week for the third time this season, leading the Bulls to a 3-0 record while averaging 35.7 points, 5.0 assists and 4.3 rebounds per game. It didn't hurt that he further solidified his position among the game's elite Friday joining Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and Wilt Chamberlain as the only players in NBA history to score 29,000 points.

That came after Jordan was named

Jamie Jee

Player of the Month for March, beating out strong performances from several players including Shaquille O'Neal, Karl Malone, and Tim Duncan. Michael also appears on the most recent issue of ESPN Magazine tackling the three M's: management, money, and more.

"Sure, I know what it takes to win a scoring title," says Jordan. "I can average 32 points a game and know I'll win. Eight points a quarter. Three baskets, two free throws. It's as easy as that." Yeah, for your everyday household name superstar.

Of course on his return, Jordan is vague. Jordan does say he won't budge on his loyalty to head coach Phil Jackson and suggests the Bulls' owners sell the team if they don't agree.

"You want odds on me coming back? Okay," says Jordan. "70-30. Which way? Whichever way you want."

As if Chicago didn't have enough problems. Scottie Pippen is obviously displeased with his current situation and is now saying he wouldn't come back even with a management change. Pippen said he wouldn't mind being a "complementary player" somewhere else, maybe with Houston and Hakeem Olajuwon.

Forward Toni Kukoc will miss at least five games with a recurring foot injury. With Luc Longley likely sidelined the rest of the season with a knee injury, even Michael will be hoping Pippen doesn't get distracted as the Bulls go for a sixth title. Jordan poured in 40 points Sunday to make it twelve in a row for the Bulls.

The question, of course, remains. Who is the heir apparent to Jordan? Piston forward Grant Hill was practically dubbed just that, coming out of Duke with a clean-cut image and the stats to back it up. We saw that even Hill has his bad days, or years for that matter though. Detroit has been struggling this year and although Hill's numbers are not way down, he has taken some criticism over his role in the firing of former Piston coach Doug Collins. Hill's attitude has seemed to change from Mr. Nice Guy to Mr. "I just want to win" guy. Just ask Alonzo Mourning, who was recently slammed to the ground by a frustrated Hill.

Piston teammate Jerry Stackhouse let his own emotions boil over when he attacked Cleveland point guard Brevin Knight. Stackhouse and the rest of the 1995 class, which includes Antonio McDyess and Joe Smith, have showed that three years is better than two in trying to evaluate a young player's talent. After talk emerged concerning 100 million dollar contracts, their market value will come down from the stratosphere after this season.

L.A. Laker Kobe Bryant had many projections thrown his way early in the season, but there is still time to prove himself. Then there is MVP candidate Tim Ducan. Duncan has helped to transform an inept San Antonio squad into a legitimate contender, assisting in one of the greatest season turnarounds in the history of the game. After winning four in a row last week, the Spurs need to win just four of their last seven to set that record.

Other "of the month" awards went to Duncan in the rookie category — again, and to Utah's Jerry Sloan for the coaching honor. Duncan, the former Wake Forest player of the year, took home the Rookie of the Month trophy for a fifth time, which sets him up as potentially becoming only the third player to win it every month. Ralph Sampson (1983-84) and fellow twin tower David Robinson (1989-90) are the only others since the award's inception in 1981-82.

Setting their own record on Sunday were Larry Bird and the Indiana Pacers. Indiana overcame an 11-point second quarter deficit to the Bucks to win 93-92. That gave the Pacers 52 for the season, tying their 1994-95 and 1995-96 best season marks.

Game of the Week: The Spurs may further experiment with their 21-foot frontcourt Wednesday at the Delta Center when they play the Utah Jazz. With Will Perdue at center, Robinson at power forward, and Duncan at small forward, San Antonio is 11-2.

UM women's lax rolls over UConn, 15–4

Meghan Magee and the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team upended Connecticut this past weekend.

STORRS, Conn. — "Together! Roll UMass!"

As the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team gets set to begin a game, the crowd hears that chant blast out of the team's pregame huddle. At the University of Connecticut on Saturday, that's exactly what they did.

The Minutewomen entered the game after having just fought to an overtime win against a very strong Brown team, boosting their record to 3–2 this year. UConn was not to present a threat, as they are a relatively young program that has yet to make a name for itself in the field of NCAA lacrosse teams.

This game normally would mean very little in the larger scheme of things, as UMass would "roll" over the infant squad and move on. On Saturday, however, the "together" part of their chant gained significance.

After 12:24 had passed in the first half, Husky midfielder Michelle Paulin beat Massachusetts goalie Tara Durkin to tie the game 3–3, and the game was less of a "rolling" than the Minutewomen were prepared for.

"Today we saw with our young group, on the whole, when you don't have a big hype around the game that we know that this team's not that strong," coach Francesca McClellan said. "It's harder to get up for it. It's harder to get mentally ready."

Up to that point, UConn had matched their more experienced counterparts score for score. Midfielder Laurie McCarthy began the scoring for Connecticut at the 25:40 mark, giving the UMass team a harsh wakeup call.

A couple minutes later, Massachusetts got on the board for the first time, as midfielder Stephanie Pavlick ducked in and out of the left wing of the Husky defense and fed the ball to a penetrating Laura Korutz, who fired the ball past junior goaltender Jennifer Schiavone.

Two scores apiece later, the game was tied up when on paper it shouldn't have been. This is the time when strong teams pull "together" and do what they're supposed to do; suppress their underdog opponents. With a total team effort, the Minutewomen proved that they are a strong team.

At the 16:11 point, Korutz whipped the ball clear across the width of the field to a breaking Melissa Anderson, who proceeded to an uncontested score to put the Minutewomen up for good.

After Paulin's score, the UMass defense stoned UConn until the 9:06 mark in the second half, after eleven unanswered goals by Massachusetts. Nine Minutewomen scored during the rout, including a hat trick by Korutz and 2 goals each by freshman Fay Naber, Anderson, and sophomores Rebecca Minaker and Sara MacNabb. Freshman attack Kara DePaula joined MacNabb by scoring her first career goal.

As the first half churned on, Durkin got quicker and quicker. By halftime, she had recorded nine impressive saves. Her teammate, Jen Nardi, played the second half and allowed only one goal over thirty minutes.

"The kids came in very casual. They took the team for granted, and they really were sloppy," McClellan said. "But I think that we made some corrections on that. We tightened up a bit and became a bit more serious and more effective."

Almost all of the first five minutes of the second half were played within twenty feet of Schiavone, producing two scores for the Minutewomen, one each for MacNabb and Minaker.

Freshman Eileen Currier finished off a solid overall game with an assist to senior Jennifer Herker to end the scoring at 4:23 left to make the final score of 15–4.

When all was said and done, Massachusetts did what they were expected to do all along, but they had to come together on the way to accomplish it. UMass rolled.

Women's gym trips up at NCAA's

By Brett Mauser

Twenty-five years ago, the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team picked up the University's first ever national title. To duplicate that performance against the top teams in the Northeast Region, the Massachusetts women's gymnastics team would need a stellar all-around performance to move on to the NCAA National Championships in Los Angeles in two weeks.

Only the winner would advance, and when the dust cleared, the Minutewomen were packing their bags for home, finishing fourth in a field of seven.

Penn State won the Regional with a 194.600, followed by Ohio State, Kent State, and then the Minutewomen, who finished with a 189.650. New Hampshire, Pittsburgh, and Rutgers rounded out the scoring.

Sophomore Mandy Mosby and freshman Jill Fisher highlighted the night in Pittsburgh. Mosby captured the balance beam title, registering a 9.875, while Fisher will try her hand in the Nationals after winning the floor exercise with a 9.975. Mosby also finished fifth on floor with a 9.775 and sixth in the all-around with a 38.475.

After two events, the Minutewomen found themselves in second place after remarkable floor and vault rotations. Mosby and Fisher led the parade on floor, while senior Penny LeBeau replaced Betsy Colucci on floor and finished 12th out of 49 competitors with a 9.700. On vault, Fisher and Michelle LoPresti tied for seventh. LeBeau again produced for the Minutewomen, notching a 9.550.

UMass track demolishes BC, 116.5–44.5

Breaking in the new outdoor season, the Massachusetts men's track team easily strolled past Boston College, 116.5– 44.5 on Saturday at the Llewelyn Derby Track. The dual meet was supposed to include Colgate but they could not attend.

Despite the frigid temperatures, UMass had no trouble of disposing the visiting Eagles, winning 16 of the 19 events.

Junior B.J. Cardoza, in his first meet for UMass, hurled himself into school history, shattering the 27-year-old hammer throw record with a toss of 191'7" and capturing first place. Cardoza, a transfer from UMass-Dartmouth, beat Edwin Arcaro's record of 190'8", set in 1971.

Sophomore Vic Morency won the discus with a throw of 175'11", a personal best. The toss placed him second all- time for UMass. Morency also won the javelin with a throw of 200.5.

Senior Tom Teye won the 100m in a time of 10.7 seconds. He also placed first in the 200m with a time of 21.4 seconds. Ryan Carrara provided the excitement of the day as he came from behind to win the steeple chase. Other notable performances for UMass include sophomore Kevin Somers' second place finish in the 5000m.

The Minutemen will host Central Connecticut, Holy Cross, Iona, and Providence on Saturday at 12 p.m. at home. This will be the last home meet of the season at the Llewelyn Derby Track for UMass.

Water polo remains perfect

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The No. 6 Massachusetts women's water polo team performed above par, easily defeated this weekend's four Collegiate Water Polo Association (CWPA) opponents, in turn keeping their 12 game win streak intact.

UMass first disposed of Boston College and Boston University in the morning session with two shutout victories, 18-0 and 15-0 respectively.

"We are just trying to do what our coach wants us to work on, and work on counter attacking, good releases and certain offensive plays," said sophomore Marcie Hupp about the teams performance this past weekend.

The afternoon session at Cambridge was a little tougher but nothing the women couldn't handle. They continued their domination of the league with a 16–3 win over Wellesley, and a 15–2 drubbing of M.I.T.

"As a team we continue to keep playing hard in games and keeping our intensity level up by practicing hard, and focusing on Easterns so that we can stay focussed," said Hupp about the state of the team.

With the wins the Minutewomen improve to 8–0 in league play, and 20–3 overall.

The morning session at Harvard was a clinic by UMass, as they held the opposition to no goals in two games. They also displayed how to get the whole team involved in the scoring.

The front and lanes defense continues to work wonders for UMass. This pressure is pushing opposing teams to submission, while goalie Peggy Nieves benefits greatly in net. Although she has been playing extraordinarily in goal, she doesn't face a huge borage of shots. This is a credit to the team's overall defensive play.

Offensively, everyone contributed as has been the story for most of the season. Marcie Hupp scored five goals in the morning session, including four

Burns compared to Imperial Roman

ATHENS, Greece (AP) — Two high-ranking Greek politicians sparred in parliament over the conduct of the U.S. ambassador, who has infuriated many Greeks with his outspoken opinions.

Parliament speaker Apostolos Kaklamanis said Monday that Ambassador Nicholas Burns acted like an "anthippatos," which in ancient Greek was used to describe a deputy governor of Imperial Rome.

"He is an ambassador, but he behaves like an anthippatos," Kaklamanis said, interrupting Deputy Foreign Minister George Papandreou while he was addressing parliament. "It's about time you reined him in."

"The Foreign Ministry is perfectly aware of how to conduct its business," Papandreou shot back.

Kaklamanis addressing Papandreou's back as he left the chamber, repeated that "the ambassador doesn't act like an ambassador."

Earlier, Papandreou defended Lums, saying: "In Greece, which is a deeply democratic country, everyone has a right to have opinions, including the American ambassador or the ambassador of any other country."

Eight planes grounded after cleaning procedure

WASHINGTON (AP) — A leading maker of jet engines pulled eight from commercial service and recalled thousands of spare parts after determining their fan blades may have suffered microscopic cracks while being cleaned.

Pratt & Whitney said yesterday that none of the suspect parts caused any safety problems, although both the company and the Federal Aviation Administration feared the cracks could cause an in-flight engine shutdown or require a pilot to make one.

The four series of engines affected power some of the world's best-known planes, including the Boeing 747, the McDonnell-Douglas DC-10 and the Airbus A-300. About 8,200 high-pressure turbine blades were identified as prone to microscopic cracking; a single engine can contain hundreds of fan blades.

The problem began with a machine used to clean the blades, said Pratt & Whitney spokesman Mark Sullivan. The machine, which went into service in January, uses ultrasonic waves to strip grease and other material from the blades and reapplies a protective coating. The engine is then sent on for servicing.

An improper calibration made the machine "overaggressive," Sullivan said, and an inspector spotted a blade thwas cracked after it had been cleaned. All the suspect parts were cleaned between Jan. 17 and Feb. 26.

Activist Parker speaks on poverty in the U.S.

ALEXANDER KORONKLAS / COLLEGIAN

Social activist Star Parker talking about "Blacks and Conservatism" in Hasbrouck yesterday evening.

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

In a speech last night, conservative social activist Star Parker said there are four requirements anyone, regardless of race or sex, can fulfill to get out of poverty.

"Anybody who wants to get out of poverty can. No matter what color or sex you are. You have to do four things," Parker said.

Parker outlined the four requirements.

"The first thing you have to do is finish your education. You must become proficient in English and math. It takes a whole lot of attitude change to stop speaking ebonics and start speaking King's English," Parker said.

"The second thing you have to do is take any job and work harder than the person above you."

Parker said the third requirement is getting off welfare and the fourth is being married.

"Thirty percent [of people] still on welfare bought the dependent welfare lie hook, line and sinker," Parker said. "The lazy conservatives speak of the importance of marriage for a healthy family. Yet, when it comes to marriage for the poor we don't think it's an important concern."

Parker also said the three of the country's biggest problems have one cause.

"The three main problems in America are AIDS, abortion and welfare and they are all rooted in sexual promiscuity," Parker said.

Parker also said in the speech that the government was hurting the poor when trying to help them.

She emphasized welfare was an incentive for people to be poor.

"If the incentive is too great to pay for someone's house or apartment if it burns down then you'll see a lot of houses and apartments burning down. If the incentive to do something is for your own personal gain you'll see more people [going on welfare]," Parker said.

Parker said when the government instituted rent control to keep landlords from exploiting poor tenants they ended up making the poor lose their homes.

"What did they do in response to rent control? They sold them as condominiums. What happened to the poor? We priced them right out of their homes," Parker said.

Parker said the minimum wage is another example of the government hurting people in poverty.

"We priced the poor right out of their jobs. People who used to create entry level jobs don't do it anymore. Self- service gas stations are an example of this. You don't have someone paid to wash the windows and check the oil," Parker said.

Parker said school choice does not help rich whites.

"I constantly hear that school choice is for rich white people. But I have to tell you something. If you're rich and white you already have school choice. It's the poor who doesn't have choice in education," Parker said.

Jewish community prepares for Passover

Seders to be held over weekend

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

This Friday evening Jews around the world will celebrate the holiday of Passover.

"Passover is a festival celebration of the Israelites freedom from slavery and exodus from Egypt," said Lissa Loeb, Jewish Campus Service Core Fellow.

Matza, or unleavened bread, is eaten during the holiday because the Hebrews could not bake bread while they lived in the desert for 40 years in search of present day Israel.

The University of Massachusetts community is preparing for the momentous holiday. The Chabad House of Amherst will be holding traditional Seders on Friday evening at 7 p.m., and Saturday evening at 8 p.m. Rabbi Chaim Addleman said that explanations of practices and Chassidic insights will be provided throughout.

The cost for each Seder is $10 per person, but nobody will be turned away because of inability to pay. Services for the seventh and eighth night of Passover will be held on April 16 and 17.

The Hillel House will also hold a Seder on Friday evening at 5:15 p.m.

On Saturday evening the Amherst Jewish Community will join Hillel in the Kosher Dinning Commons at 6:30 p.m.

Today is the last day to sign up for the Seders.

In conjunction with the Seders, the Kosher Meal Plan will be serving three meals a day for the week of Passover, which would make it much easier for students to adhere to the holiday's dietary restrictions.

Throughout the rest of the semester, the Kosher Meal Plan only serves dinner on the weekdays or brunch on the weekends.

"The food is going to be incredible," Loeb said.

The menus are currently posted in the Hillel House. Today is also the last day to sign up for this weeklong option.

Loeb said that for those who cannot make the meals, she will be handing out Kosher snacks at the Campus Center Concourse Monday through Thursday between 10 a.m. and 1 p.m.

In addition she will also be running a program called "Women's Passover Celebration" on Wednesday, April 15 at 7 p.m.

For information regarding events at the Chabad house, students may call 549-4094. For events at the Hillel House, students can call 549-1710. Students looking for more information regarding the Kosher Meal Plan can call 545- 1362.

Tomoxifen reduces breast cancer risks

By Paul Recer
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Women at increased risk of breast cancer face a difficult decision about whether to take a drug that cuts in half the chance of getting breast cancer while raising the risk of serious side effects.

Federal researchers announced Monday that tamoxifen, which has been used for more than two decades to fight cancer, also can reduce the risk of breast cancer by 45 percent among women who are at high risk of developing the disease.

But Dr. Richard Klausner, head of the National Cancer Institute, said the benefits of the drug also carry some danger, including the possibility of life-threatening blood clots.

"The results tell us that breast cancer can be prevented, but there is no simple take-home message," Klausner said. "There are important and serious side effects from this drug.

"The message is not simple," he said, noting that each decision must be made individually by each woman at risk.

Klausner said that women at Gandhi vows reform of India's long-ruling party

By Ranjan Roy
Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — Promising to revive and reform the divided Congress Party, Sonia Gandhi won confirmation Monday as leader of India's longest-ruling party.

Gandhi, the widow of a former prime minister and heir to India's most renowned political dynasty, had been aloof from the public since her husband, Rajiv, was assassinated in 1991. But she accepted the presidency last month after the party ousted Sitaram Kesri, whose divisive politics had driven dozens of leaders out of the party to set up splinter groups.

Gandhi's confirmation completes the transformation of the reclusive widow into one of India's most powerful politicians. The Congress party, which ruled India for most of the country's 50 years of independence, has suffered two successive election routs.

"The greatest enemy of the Congress is the Congress itself. Nothing can shake the party if it remains united," Gandhi told 1,000 delegates to the party's convention Monday.

Making her speech in Hindi and English from a dais where leaders sat cross-legged on white mattresses, she promised greater democracy within the party, which has not had internal elections for years — its leaders usually have been chosen by a small coterie in New Delhi.

Having heard more than 30 speakers outline reasons and offer explanations for the party's decline, Gandhi said she was appointing a committee to suggest ways of making party leaders more accountable and decision making more democratic.

She also exhorted leaders to travel to the villages and revive the dormant local party organizations.

"We have to get to get over our weaknesses and remain in touch with the people," Gandhi said, urging delegates to regain the confidence of the lower castes and Muslims whose support once made Congress invincible.

The one-day session of the All India Congress Committee, a forum of state leaders, is the first since general elections in February and March resulted in a coalition government led by the Hindu-nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party.

Gandhi, 51, has been considered a party power broker for years by virtue of her position as heir to Congress' political dynasty. Between her late husband; his mother, Indira Gandhi; and Indira's father, Jawaharlal Nehru, the family led India for 35 of its 50 years since independence.

increased risk of breast cancer will need to have a thorough discussion with their doctors, examining every factor of their personal health history, before deciding whether tamoxifen is appropriate for them. He said his agency is developing guidelines to help women decide what to do.

Tamoxifen should be used only by women at higher than average risk of breast cancer because the drug's side effects include doubling the risk of getting endometrial cancer. The increased risk for this cancer is about equal to that of women on estrogen replacement therapy. Tamoxifen also causes a tripling of risk for a blood clot in the lungs, a potentially fatal disorder.

Nevertheless, tests of tamoxifen mark "the first time in history that we have evidence that breast cancer cannot only be treated, but also prevented," said Dr. Bernard Fisher, an Allegheny University professor and scientific director of the study that involved more than 13,000 women.

The drug, taken daily, costs from $80 to $100 a month, said Klausner.

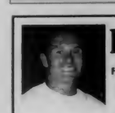
Tamoxifen is known as an "anti-estrogen" because it blocks the effects of the hormone in some tissues and retards growth of cancer cells that depend upon estrogen.

Federal officials said that breast cancer benefits from the drug are so clear that they cut short a long-term clinical trial and notified the 13,388 women participants of the finding. The 6,707 women in the study who had been taking a placebo, or dummy drug, will be told they may now start taking tamoxifen, officials said. As a side benefit, the study also indicated that tamoxifen lowered the risk in older women of fractures of the back, neck, or wrist due to brittle bones, or osteoporosis.

Klausner emphatized that the proven benefit of the drug is only for women at an above-average risk of developing breast cancer. The level of risk depends upon a woman's age, her medical history and those of her mother and sisters, and her reproductive history.

Breast cancer risk increases with age, officials said, and they estumated that only about 0.3 percent of women 39 and younger would be candidates for tamoxifen.

The percentage of women at increased risk goes up to 2.7 percent for ages 40 to 44; to 7.1 percent for 45-49; 9.3 percent for 50-54; and to 12.5 percent for women ages 55 to 59.



Klausner said it also is unclear just how long women should take the drug. The study lasted only six years, and some women took the drug for less, he said. Final effects of tamoxifen may still be years away, he said.

Despite the complexities and the problems, Klausner said, the major unprecedented effect of the study is to prove that a drug can be developed to actually prevent a high-risk group from developing cancer.

"This is the first imperfect, but very encouraging step," he said, toward drugs that could protect people from lung, rectal, bowel or prostate cancer. About 85 other drugs are being tested for this preventive effect.

In the study:

- Women taking the drug had 45 percent fewer cases of invasive breast cancer compared to those taking a placebo — 85 cases vs. 154.
- Patients on tamoxifen had fewer noninvasive breast cancers; 31 vs. 59.
- There were 47 bone fractures among those on the drug, compared with 71 among those on placebo.
- Among the group on the drug, there were 33 cases of cancer of the uterine lining, vs. 14 cases in the placebo group; 17 cases of blood clots in the lung, including two deaths, compared with six cases and no deaths among the placebo group.

Parker said religion should be allowed in the classroom.

"Why can't they let these poor kids go to private schools that involve religion?" Parker said, arguing that religion in school keeps students well-behaved.

"These kids are out of control in the classroom because we have told them they are incapable of learning," she said. "In private schools a teacher looks out at a class and says 'Each one of you can learn.' If you try not to learn we send you to the principal's office and he has a stick and your mother signed a form saying he can use it on your butt."

Parker also said unions and minimum wage hurt blacks.

"Unions were created to keep blacks out. Minimum wage is because blacks would take jobs at any price," Parker said.

Water found on Saturn's largest moon

By Edith M. Lederer
Associated Press

LONDON — Europe's infrared space observatory has discovered water in many unexpected places — including a moon of Saturn — raising expectations of life elsewhere in the universe, the European Space Agency said yesterday.

The discovery of water vapor in the atmosphere of Titan, Saturn's largest moon, may indicate that conditions there duplicate those that gave birth to life on Earth, said Roger Bonnet, the agency's director of science.

"Now that water has been discovered... the only thing you need is a little heat, to heat up Titan, and maybe the birth of life may be seen," he said.

Previous findings indicated water existed in the far reaches of the solar system. Most recently, scientists have found evidence of a possible ocean beneath the surface of Europa, a moon of Jupiter. For 2 1/2 years, the European Space Agency's Infrared Space Observatory, known as ISO, has been orbiting high above Earth, exploring the universe at wavelengths that can't be seen with the human eye.

Hustler publisher indicted again

Flynt and brother charged with pandering obscenity

By John Nolan
Associated Press

CINCINNATI — Hustler magazine publisher Larry Flynt was indicted yesterday on obscenity and other counts in the city where he was convicted of the same charge in 1977 for distributing his magazine.

Flynt and brother Jimmy both were charged with nine counts of pandering obscenity, three counts of disseminating matter harmful to juveniles, two counts of conspiracy to engage in a pattern of corrupt activity and one count of engaging in a pattern of corrupt activity, Hamilton County Prosecutor Joseph Deters said in a news conference.

The charges cite videos sold in Flynt's downtown store, not the magazine itself. Flynt had indicated he wanted a court test of his magazine.

Deters said the Flynts are charged with selling an obscene videotape to a 14-year-old boy, and accused of a pattern of selling materials Deters said are obscene in Ohio.

Deters would not fully describe the content of the videos cited in the indictment.

"These videos are of such a nature that they would not be appropriate for discussion at this conference," he said.

Flynt's 1977 conviction was thrown out on appeal and he was never retried. He opened the store in October, challenging law enforcement authorities by selling Hustler, adult videos, sex toys and mainstream publications at the store.

He has repeatedly told reporters in recent months that he wanted a trial on obscenity charges, because he believed that a jury would find that Hustler does not violate community obscenity standards.

Being cleared in such a trial would make it easier for him to persuade other Cincinnati retailers to sell Hustler, he said. Flynt did not return a message left at his Los Angeles offices, and his lawyer in Columbus, H. Louis Sirkin, also did not return a call.

Deters said he did not know when a trial would occur.

The maximum penalty, if the brothers were convicted of all charges, would be 24 years in prison. The charges also are punishable by probation.

Former office worker testifies about Willey

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A former White House volunteer said yesterday she was questioned by a grand jury about Kathleen Willey, a onetime colleague in the social office who accused the president of making an unwanted sexual advance.

Harolyn Cardozo did not respond, however, when reporters asked whether she was questioned about anything her father — millionaire developer Nathan Landow — might have told Willey.

Independent counsel Kenneth Starr reportedly wants to know whether Landow, a major Democratic fundraiser from Maryland, urged Willey not to tell Paula Jones's lawyers about her encounter with Clinton near the Oval Office in late November 1993.

Clinton has denied making an advance toward Willey when she asked him if she could have a paid position on the White House staff.

Reading a statement outside the courthouse, Mrs. Cardozo said. "I willingly responded to questions related to my relationship with Kathleen Willey, with whom I served as a volunteer in the White House social office. I answered all questions to the best of my ability. I answered those questions truthfully and forthrightly."

The Monica Lewinsky grand jury also summoned the chronicler of Oval Office meetings, on a day that House Majority Leader Dick Armey stood by his statement that he would resign if faced with the sexual allegations raised against President Clinton.

Janis Kearney, who keeps official records but also writes a daily diary spiced with her observations, testified before the grand jury investigating a possible presidential affair and coverup but would not comment upon leaving the courthouse.

Meanwhile, Armey, the Texan who is the No. 2 man in the House Republican leadership, continued his harsh criticism of the president.

A day after telling high school students he would resign if faced with the kinds of sexual misconduct allegations raised against Clinton, Armey said in a statement: "I stand by my remarks, which reinforced the importance of personal responsibility."

Armey said that when he spoke to government students at the high school in Coppell, Texas on Monday, "I could not let these children think this president is a good role model." He said Clinton should be held to the high standards expected "from teachers, football coaches and CEO's."

Armey called the president "a shameless person," and said: "If it were me that had documented personal conduct along the lines of the president's, I would be so filled with shame that I would resign. This president won't do that. His basic credo in life is, 'I will do whatever I can get away with.'"

The No. 3 man in the House Republican leadership, Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas, also has been harshly critical of Clinton, giving a series of floor speeches in recent days questioning the president's character.

But the top House Republican leader, Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia, said he didn't agree with Armey but said he though "the president should tell the country the truth."

"I think that the rest of us ought to be patient and wait for Judge Starr to report," Gingrich said.

Presidential aide Paul Begala responded yesterday, "If goofy ideas ever go to $40 a barrel, I want the drilling rights to Dick Armey's head. This is further proof that the right wing of the Republican Party is using the Starr investigation for partisan advantage."

Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr is investigating whether Clinton had an affair with Lewinsky and asked her to lie about it under oath. Clinton and Lewinsky have denied the allegations as part of the now-dismissed Paula Jones lawsuit, but Lewinsky — in conversations taped by a friend — said there was an affair. Kearney, who is the Oval Office records manager, keeps track of all the schedules, briefing memor and other papers that flow through the president's office.

But she also keeps a daily account of presidential activities, choosing at whim which high-level meetings and presidential functions she wants to narrate for history's sake.

Rather than write a dry account of Clinton's day — a career diarist does that — the onetime weekly newspaper publisher spices her summary with her own observations.

"Mrs. Clinton was the hit of the (White House) family and received loads of applause," she wrote on one occasion. Another time she said that an unscheduled presidential jog "meant he would be more than his usual tardy for his first scheduled event." Kearney has been making such observations since 1995, but late last year, her diary became caught up in Justice Department and congressional investigations of campaign fund raising.

Man arrested after stopping crash suspect

By Bob Miller
Associated Press

DURHAM, N.C. — Jeff Bell leaped into action when he saw a motorist crash into another vehicle and speed away, chasing after the suspect and eventually cornering him on a dead-end street. But Bell got arrested himself because he pulled out a pistol and opened fire in a residential cul-de-sac trying to shoot out the hit-and-run car's tires.

"There were no thanks whatsoever, other than 'We're going to have to arrest you, Mr. Bell,'" he said. "I hate that the police see me as a bad person, but I was just trying to help."

Bell, 31, pleaded innocent yesterday to a felony charge of discharging a firearm into an occupied vehicle.

"If I had tried to shoot the guy, or through his window or his door, then I could understand," Bell said. "I did feel like my life was in danger."

On Saturday, Bell saw a car drive through a red light in front of the auto parts store he manages and strike a pickup at about 50 mph.

"This wasn't a little fender-bender," Bell said. Both women in the pickup were taken to a hospital for treatment.

The driver of the car hit the gas and took off.

Bell ran to his van and set out in pursuit, joined by two people in another van.

Along the way, he called 911 and gave police directions until he and the people in the other van had the man cornered in a residential cul-de-sac.

Bell got out and waved at the driver to stop, but the man turned his vehicle around and started toward him, Bell said. That's when he reached for his 9mm pistol and fired one shot.

Bell said he aimed for a rear tire and consciously avoided shooting toward the driver. He apparently missed, striking only the pavement, and the motorist kept going.

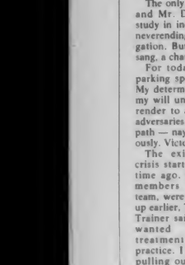
Car wars



He's just standing there.

The guy in the party black mock turtleneck and slim-fit slacks is just standing there, as spikily aloof as his hair. I drive by him again, hoping this will be my final circle.

How long has it been, you ask? Minutes? Days? Weeks? Who knows?

The only constant has been me and Mr. Depeche Mode, he a study in inertia, me a pawn in a neverending state of circumnavigation. But as Sam Cooke once sang, a change is gonna come.

For today, I shall snag that parking spot in the Boyden lot. My determinist spirit intact and my will unbent, I shall not surrender to any of the numerous adversaries who have blocked my path — nay, my destiny — previously. Victory shall be mine.

C. Taylor Conner

The existential crisis started some time ago. We, the members of the team, were to show up earlier, Todd the Trainer said, if we wanted proper treatment before practice. I obliged, pulling out of the Puffton slums at 2:30 p.m. that Monday. That fateful Monday.

I should have known better when I arrived at Boyden to find the sharks swimming in their familiar oval-shaped pattern around the lot. There were plenty of open spaces in the adjoining red-sticker area, but when you have enough unpaid parking tickets to wallpaper Versailles thrice, you hesitate to march down the yellow-envelope road any further.

Anyway, Mr. Depeche was in the peasant lot and appeared to have been there for days — a second omen. I should have turned and peeled out. Didn't. Assuming it would be a simple matter of moments before parking was a possibility, I rolled into the pool with the other fishes.

Fifteen minutes slipped by without any meter departures. I was slightly miffed. Then we all smelled the blood in the water — a leaver. The sharks converged, but I was nearest to the kill. Or so I thought.

Just as I flipped on my blinker, a little red late-model sports car swerved into the open asphalt. My lip inched its way into a slow sneer. The girl, hair badly blonded and Aniston-scissored, bounded out of her Acura Integra, a cigarette dangling from her mouth. I could barely discern the features of a face underneath the make-up. Then I looked at the license plate.

New Jersey. OH MY GOD.

I swiveled my head in every direction, making out as many of the shark plates as I could. Jersey. Jersey. Connecticut. Jersey. Jersey. Connecticut. Connecticut. Jersey. Alaska. Jer— Alaska?

The reality began to dawn on me — it was me versus the aerobics chicks. Physics never made much sense to me, but I knew that this magnetic swirl had a sort of inevitable quality to it. The only question that remained was how I was to become the ion, breaking free to park in peace.

And Joe Depeche, perhaps knowingly, touched a tad.

For hours, every available crevasse into which I could slide amy car seemed to close up in a turning signal-less blur of cherry. The driver then would emerge lazily from the automobile, and each time she smirked, stamping a butt beneath her feet, I dreamt of doing the same to her spandexed hind quarters.

Following these cars around the lot did have one benefit, however. I never studied a classical language, but having spent days reading Greek off the window-placed bumper stickers of these ladies' motor chariots and sweatshirts, I can now translate Sophocles from the original text.

By this time I had also become intensely obsessed with all things circular. Family Circle. "Family Circus." Circle of Friends. "Circle of Life."

I also came to understand there was a certain method to the madness and a madness to the method when it came to acquiring a spot. Those who danced the roundabout were subject to narrowly missing or ducking it out for a space all day. People who eschewed the doughnut game in favor of staking out certain corners of the lot were taking a conservative and sometimes unfruitful path. Either way, the aerochicks were in charge.

Despite the chaos, Sir Depeche of the Boyden Modes did not stir.

Insanity had begun to set in. I wheeled my Cherokee into reverse, coasting several laps with the rearview mirror as my guide. I gave my center console a pet name — Han Consolo. And I found myself singing along to that insipid Natalie Imbruglia tripe-fest "Torn." The end was near.

But then, today, it happened. As I edged down a straightaway, I noticed a leaver budging ever so slightly out of her spot. My eyes wild with delight, I dashed toward nirvana, my competition racing from the opposite direction. Like Mothra warring against King Kong, the din of Japanese and American metal colliding echoed in the snapping wind.

Au revoir, mon Acura.

Staggering from my car, I saw one of my teammates, Vinny, exiting the building.

"Conner, if you're looking for Todd, he's down in Mullins," he smiled. "Oh, and can I get a ride?"

A mangled, maniacal grin crept across my lips as I responded. "Sure." There was only one thing left to do.

"Depeche Man," I asked the stranger, "Why are you here?"

"Dude, I've been waiting forever for this Godot guy."

Suddenly, things didn't seem so bad after all.

Dictators, U.S. involvement and poets

Eight years after a constitutional democracy was reestablished in Chile, the Latin American Legacy of Dictatorship is still evident, as a former head of state is deemed "untouchable," by the law.

Reaction to Pinochet

Augusto Pinochet, the architect behind the 1979 coup of the elected leftist government and brutal dictator of Chile for 17 years, stepped down last month as commander in chief of the nation's armed forces. Although he relinquished control of the government in 1990, he was able to maintain his position in the military despite the fact that his government is credited with killing more that 3,000 of its political opponents.

Not only has Pinochet been able to avoid prosecution for his orders, but the 82-year-old general was granted the constitutional privilege given to heads of state, a senate seat for life. How can a nation which is trying to forge a democracy in the wake of a brutal dictatorship honor the architect of that dictatorship with such an important position?

Senator Jorge Lavanderos, a Christian Democrat said in the March 11 issue of The New York Times, "Everywhere else except Chile, evil dictators go into exile. Hitler, Mussolini, Papa Doc were never allowed to be part of the legitimate democratic process. Why should Pinochet?"

Forget about term limits, this guy will be making policy for the rest of his life (however long that is). Forget about stealing opposition party secrets or allegedly sleeping with an intern; Pinochet is known to have had his own people killed.

United States involvement

As United States citizens, we should be appreciative for the rights we have and the stability our government guarantees us. However, at the same time, we must realize that we (as in our government) are somewhat responsible for the dictatorships that have existed in Chile and throughout Latin America in the 20th century. The policies of the U.S. government may not have caused bloody regimen like Pinochet's, but these policies sometimes helped them along.

The reasons behind the rise of Latin American dictatorships are complex and very greatly from nation to nation; but there are some common denominators we can explore.

European colonialism was supplanted by a kind of economic colonialism implemented by the United States. We coined the term "Banana Republic," as a derogatory way to describe a one-crop economy. In the Cold War, the U.S. routinely backed right-wing dictators because they kept the elected leftist or even communist governments we were wary of out of power. In the 1930s, Franklin Roosevelt began a "good neighbor" policy in attempt to improve relations with Latin America, but needless to say our government both before and after Roosevelt has not always been a good neighbor.

The political struggle of the poet

The 1973 coup in Chile was one of the bloodiest, and one of the most under-emphasized historical events since World War II. Since the 1930s, leftists and communists have often mounted the most resistance to right wing dictatorships. One of the most powerful opponents of dictatorship and one of the most famous victims of the 1973 coup was not a military leader, but a poet.

Pablo Neruda, recipient of the 1971 Nobel Prize for Literature combined poetry and politics to empower the people and challenge dictatorships. He was not fond of the U.S. government and the U.S. government was not fond of him.

Bryan Schwartzman

He had to flee the authorities once Pinochet took power. Stricken with prostate cancer, however, his death was sped up by the lack of medical care he received while he was fleeing. Neruda had faced dictatorship before in his life; he witnessed the rise of Franco in Spain and the horror of the Spanish Civil War.

In the late 1940s, Neruda was an elected communist senator in Chile representing the mining district. Here, too, a right-wing dictatorship took over the country forcing Neruda to flee his homeland and go into exile. While in hiding, he wrote some of his most powerful poetry concerning Latin America and U.S.-Latin American relations. His poem "The Dictators," portrays life under dictatorship as an inherent paradox.

In his epic book Canto General, or universal song to Latin America, he describes his joy as an exile, both in personal and political terms. Joy was knowing that everything had been taken away from him and he was still human.

Remember our neighbors

Neruda loved the American landscape and the American people, but he disliked the policies of our government. We need more of a conscious awareness of the area of the world which is closest in proximity to us. As citizens we may be separate from the government, but we have an obligation to monitor the policies of our government and voice ourselves when we feel they are unjust.

The crossword problem

So here's the deal; I've got this new addiction. And it involves a drug infinitely more treacherous and fiendish than my former habit, my computer. So, I have to 'fess up: I'm totally head over heels into crossword puzzles.

Don't even ask where the madness started. I have no clue. Before, I used to watch crossword aficionados with that kindly mixture of amusement and bewilderment, without ever suspecting that one day I would join the ranks of those who are confident enough to use pens to solve The New York Times crossword puzzle.

Seema Gangatirkar

See, for those of us who never crossword, this whole thing of finding words to fit in little white boxes is as foreign as that Olympic sport, curling. The amount of panic a crossword puzzle can induce is strangely bewildering as the solver runs amuck trying to find that one word that relates to a "small African village" in order to finish the darn thing.

Frankly, my brain cells didn't seem able to grasp anything about crossword puzzles and hence I never understood the intensity put into the search for an eight-letter word meaning "obstruction of a blood vessel by a foreign particle." Like, what is the big deal? Is it really a matter of life and death if you do not know this eight-letter word?

For instance, I would walk into class and a friend would immediately assail me with "Seema, do you know a four- letter word for rope?"

"Uh, no. But you know, a hello would certainly be appreciated."

"Sure, next time. But do you know what 34 down is?"

So much for deep friendship; she would do her crossword puzzle and I would twiddle my thumbs, wondering what madness had gripped her.

After a while, I decided to check out what all the fuss was about. After all, we do get calls down here at the Collegian asking what the answer to 22 across is, so obviously this crossword mania was not solely restricted to my friends.

So one day, instead of flipping through the news, editorials or arts, I moved straight to the back page and focused on the little black and white grid. I could make like Scully and Mulder and investigate this paranormal activity known as crossword puzzle addiction.

Armed with a purple mechanical pencil, I began the process of slowly deciphering the clues. "Baby deliverer" was easy; stork. A nine-headed monster equaled the hydra and the son of Aphrodite was Cupid. So far so good. At this point, I was licking my lips with relish, thinking, hey, this crossword stuff ain't so hard.

Which, as you all know, are famous last words in any situation.

"Ms. Lollobrigida" raised my eyebrows and this particular arts girl had no idea of what could possibly constitute a Big Ten school starting with the letter "O." But here was the deal: I had most of the crossword puzzle filled out and there were these five words completely impeding my progress towards crossword nirvana.

My blood pressure rose, my hands started to shake and I knew I was in trouble. I turned the paper around and looked at it from all different angles; maybe eyeing the clue upside down would give me some hint to the answer and elevate this self-induced misery. Then I started staring intently at 18 down, thinking that maybe if I just glare at the tiny script long enough, the answer would automatically come.

But it was no use; by the time my friend slid into her chair next to me, I was already attacking her with "I need a four letter word for 'Ms. Lollobrigida.'"

"Hello would be nice," she replied.

I tried to fit the word "hello" into the space and realized it was one letter too long.

"Four letters, not five," I said in frustration.

My friend threw her arms up in despair and said, "You're one of them."

"One of who?"

"Those crossword people."

Moi? One of them? The mind recoiled from such a sentiment. How could I possibly be as addicted as some of those I've seen beady-eyed over their crosswords? Surely I had more willpower than them. Besides, this was only my first time attempting the darn thing and I could quit anytime.

Well, so much for quitting. I now know nothing about what's going on in the world since I seem to head to the crossword puzzle before any other section in the paper. But in case you were wondering what the eight-letter word for an "obstruction of a blood vessel by a foreign particle," it's embolism.

Dismissal of Paula Jones' case: right or wrong?

Back to business for Bill

The plaintiffs' allegations fall far short of the rigorous standards for establishing a claim of outrage under Arkansas law."

With those words, U.S. District Judge Susan Weber Wright, an appointee of President Bush, has dramatically altered the political landscape of the remaining years of the Clinton presidency.

While Clinton still must deal with Special Prosecutor Kenneth Starr's Whitewater investigation and allegations surrounding his relationship with Monica Lewinsky, he has largely been freed to return his presidency to normal.

Wright ruled that the "Quid pro quo and hostile work environment sexual harassment claims are without merit."

She did say that the alleged behavior, in which Clinton allegedly dropped his pants and requested oral sex from Jones, was "boorish and offensive," but ruled the lawsuit, filed by Jones with the aide of assorted right-wingers, to be capricious.

Jones claimed she suffered trauma after the incident, but the most serious complaint she filed was that she didn't receive flowers the next Secretary's Day.

For this reason Jones has tried for three years to bring the workings of a popularly elected president to a halt.

Not being able to stop the Clinton administration at the ballot box, conservatives have tried to circumvent the will of the people by paralyting the administration. For three years, too much public focus and too many administration resources have been dedicated to the lawsuit.

However, Judge Wright has taken some of the ambiguousness out of sexual harassment law, determining that Jones did not suffer as a result of the incident.

Jones continued to work at the Arkansas Industrial Development Commission for 19 months afterward and received regular raises.

She never formally complained to her supervisors.

Jones apparently wasn't harmed by that incident, but other women might be.

The Paula Jones case might make it harder to file sexual harassment cases in the future, as the woman's motives might be more thoroughly questioned.

It might be assumed she is seeking to harm the plaintiff instead of trying to redress her complaint, as it appears that Jones was doing.

America's women are not the only ones hurt by Jones' lawsuit. President Clinton, rightly or wrungly, will always be remembered as a womanizer. The nation has been hurt as its chief executive has been forced to devote his resources to the lawsuit instead of improving the nation.

With the remaining time that Clinton has to serve, he would benefit — and our country would benefit — if he could simply focus on doing America's business, and not on frivolous claims about his sex life.

Justice not served

◄Point Counterpoint►

There are many things good in this world.

There's the fact the Utes beat Arizona.

There's also the fact the Utes beat North Carolina. The Jazz are playing well going down the home stretch.

Skiing up in the canyons is still good. The valley is warming up and spring time weather is on the way. Traffic accident rates have gone down due to the current lack of snow. Crime in New York City is down. The Star Trek Experience is just a few hours away in Las Vegas. The quarter is new and nobody is failing any classes yet.

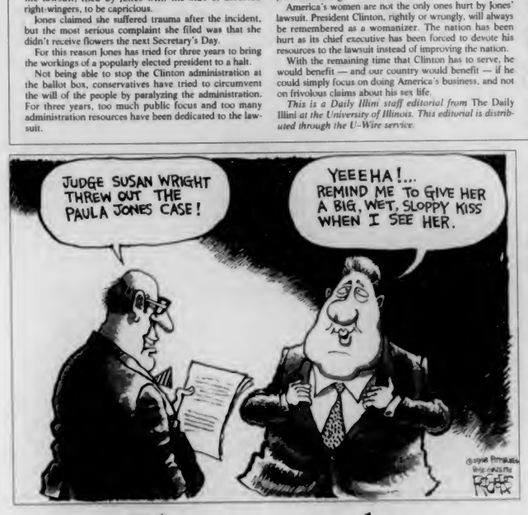
There are also many things in the world which are not quite right. For example, sometimes our justice system doesn't work. To demonstrate, in a shocking ruling, Paula Jones' case against President Bill Clinton was formally dismissed yesterday by U.S. District Judge Susan Webber Wright.

Sometimes our justice system doesn't work.

Wright, in a 39-page ruling said, "The plaintiff's allegations fall far short of the rigorous standards for establishing a claim of outrage."

According to Jones, on May 8, 1991, in a room at the Excelsior Hotel in Little Rock, Ark., then Gov. Clinton tried to kiss her, exposed his penis to her and then asked her to perform oral sex. She also said that the encounter caused her to suffer "extreme anxiety, intrusive thoughts and memories, and consequent sexual aversion."

Realizing the case is her word against his word, if there is any truth to the allegations, they sure sound outrageous.



Wright's decision was a shock to both the Clinton and Jones camps. In fact, President Clinton suspected he might be the victim of some practical April Fools' Day joke. We could only be so lucky.

Whether or not Wright was correct in assuming that Clinton's alleged improper behavior did not constitute sexual harassment was not for her to decide. Jones should have been given a day in court with a jury of her peers. That's the way the justice system works, or should.

On May 27, 1997, America thought that was exactly what was going to happen. The Supreme Court unanimously ruled that day that Jones' case could go forward during Clinton's second term. They ruled that, "Like every other citizen who properly invokes that jurisdiction [of the Federal District Court] respondent [Jones] has a right to an orderly disposition of her claims."

Knowing she does have such a right, let's hope the appeals process works the way it should.

Blowing smoke

There is an ongoing debate about the fate of a ban on public smoking. Opponents to a ban claim anti-smokers are trying to tell smokers how to live their lives. They feel that because they are aware of the risks associated with smoking, they should be allowed to do what they want to themselves without intervention. That is not the real issue here.

The controversy has centered around a ban on smoking in bars in Amherst scheduled to be enforced this summer. Some opponents to the ban argue that alcohol has just as many ill effects as cigarette smoking. This fact doesn't justify their argument against a ban, however. Both health issues need to be solved. I would be among the first to welcome restrictions on the amount of alcohol that can be sold to any one individual in a bar. You don't justify one wrongdoing by pointing at others — you should right both wrongs. This isn't really at the core of the problem, but it needs to be addressed that this is not a valid argument on the part of opponents to the ban.

The problem is, it isn't just cigarette smokers who are contracting health problems.

Justin Smith

There are a number of legitimate reasons why I feel smoking should be banned in all public places. I could point out the sheer number of cigarette butts that cover the ground of the campus. Yes, I know that not all smokers are litterbugs, but nonetheless, there is no denying that there are many who do not care where they leave their trash. The result is that the campus is made to look like a landfill, not a pristine place of education. One could argue that the janitors can clean it up, but funding for that work has to come from somewhere. The funding would come from tuition of both smokers and non-smokers alike.

I could also point out that cigarette companies market to children, and supporting these industrial giants only encourages their actions. But, neither of these two points are really at the core of the issue.

It doesn't really matter to me what smokers are going to do to themselves. If they want to increase their odds for getting lung cancer, emphysema or other often fatal illnesses, then so be it. If they wish to smell like the smoke they inhale, I won't stop them. In fact, I'm all for the idea of large buildings having smoking rooms. I even feel that bars are not public places, but rather, are the private property of the owner, who should make the decision on his own. I don't want to force people to stop smoking cigarettes altogether.

The problem is, it isn't just cigarette smokers who are contracting health problems. How could anyone justify forcing these risks on me for the sake of their habit? In my opinion, my right (and that of other non-smokers) to a healthy life is far more meaningful than the right to continue a habit. And I don't have any choice about it. I have to walk through campus to get to classes, or to eat in the dining hall, and, whether I like it or not, I'm going to end up walking through a cloud of cigarette smoke on the way.

For someone of relatively normal health, this is already a considerable problem. But look at what happens in the case of people with asthma. My younger brother once had this disease quite severely, and cigarette smoke used to always cause a reaction. Young children, too, can be affected dramatically by second hand cigarette smoke, since their level of cellular development is at a highly accelerated rate. This means that deformations caused by cigarette smoke can have an enormous effect on their probability of contracting some kind of cancer or other illness.

When people are allowed to smoke in public, the lawbooks that permit it are essentially saying they don't care about people with asthma. "Children?" they ask, "Who cares? We have to protect the rights of people who smoke, and the rights of tobacco industries to make a profit." For this reason, I think we need to take a very good look at these laws, as well as our responsibilities to promote a healthy environment for others. And it is for this reason that I will support any effort towards a public smoking ban.

The little things

I was walking across campus with my friend Andrew earlier today. Just strolling to class, chatting about nothing really. The mood was decidedly pleasant. Andrew casually reached into his pocket, and removed his hand with a gasp of joy.

"I have a dime!" he stated.

"You have a dime?" I replied, not recognizing the immediate benefits that this discovery might behold.

"Yes. I have a dime, this means that I now have exactly enough money to buy one slice of Antonio's cheese pizza." Andrew answered, a huge grin spreading across his face at the prospect of devouring a steaming hot piece of pizza, yummy cheese melted all over it, perhaps a little bit of garlic or hot pepper sprinkled on top (because they give that to you for free).

Then I had a revelation: It really doesn't take much to make a college student deliriously happy.

I enjoy being a student. I really do. But you have to admit that being a student requires sacrificing some of the luxuries that one takes for granted while living at home with parents — the constant availability of dimes being one of them. Then there's food, free heat and even someone who sometimes does your laundry for you. These things that I never gave a second thought to back in the day now constantly occupy my thoughts. So it becomes the little things that make me happy.

I hope that when I leave college, simply having milk in my refrigerator will not be the most exciting event of my week.

It's not only dimes that become little treasures waiting to be found. Quarters are very important too. The other day I was forced to confront the daunting task of doing my laundry. With my limited supply of quarters, I was pondering the manner in which I was going to wash all my clothes. I had twelve quarters, just enough to do either two loads of wash, no dry, or one load of wash, one dryer for thirty minutes and buy a soda. What to do, what to do. Then I saw them, gleaming from the depths beneath my bed, four shiny little disks that meant I was going to be able to do both washes and dries. Now, this would not normally be an exciting occurrence, but to a college student, with not one pair of clean socks left in sight, a dollar in quarters was my savior.

But finding spare change isn't the only means of bringing joy into my otherwise rather pathetic existence. One of the things that makes me quite happy is milk, which we rarely have in our refrigerator. It's like those "Got Milk?" ads are a cruel taunt directed specifically towards me because somebody out there knows that I, as a matter of fact, do not have any milk. As a result, I was forced to make my Kraft Macaroni and Cheese with water once again last night. So, when I open up the refrigerator and see that container with the Hood label pasted on it, I get an instant rush. The opportunity to eat a bowl of cereal in the morning is a rare prospect. But discovering actual cereal in my pantry is also a rare occurrence, and when the two discoveries actually coincide it makes me want to dance. These are things that do not occur in the real world. I hope that when I leave college, simply having milk in my refrigerator will not be the most exciting event of my week.

In the same respect, it can often take something very small to upset routine of a college student. Such an occurrence took place in my living room last Saturday. My two roommates nearly came to blows over a sandwich, I swear.

They had ordered from The Sub and had eagerly awaited their food, when finally it arrived. Two steaming chicken cutlet subs, one with veggies, one with just cheese and mayo. Not a big deal, I thought, chicken cutlet is chicken cutlet, right? Not so, apparently.

"Wait, I ordered all the veggies," Jaimie said as Cristi was already breaking into her sub.

"Well, they obviously messed up," was the response between bites.

Jaimie: "Well, you called, so you should take this one."

Cristi: "I told them all the veggies."

Jaimie: "Well, I'll just take half of it then."

Cristi: "I hate cheese."

Jaimie: "Well, I hate cheese too," (not true, Jaimie loves cheese.)

Cristi: "Well, I can't eat this."

"Fine, do you want this back?" Jaimie thrusts half of the veggie sub, minus a few bites back at Cristi.

Cristi: "Forget it."

I guess they had a right to be upset about the mixup, they paid for their subs with dimes.

A message of warning

To those who drink, you may believe you're not hurting anyone. You're just having a good time, just kicking back after yet another hectic week of exams, papers, protests and presentations.

However, you are hurting someone. I'm not talking about knocking off a few brain cells (which you wouldn't have used anyway) or even damaging your liver. No, I'm talking about the infringement on the rights of those of us who don't drink (we're such nerds), the lies you probably tell your parents (they don't care anyway, right?), and the loss of friends due to an argument that arose either because of drunkenness or a hangover. That's not a rational way for emotions to occur. The end result of overdrinking is always pain. I'm talking about alcoholism. I'm not talking about an occasional glass of wine with dinner, or even a few drinks on the weekend every now and again. I'm talking about those at UMass who drink excessively.

Every weekend, the majority of this campus gets smashed. The following week, they share their drunken stories, slurred along with swaying detail, with the rest of us. By the end of the week, they're discussing (obnoxiously loud) how the coming weekend they're going to get more plastered than your average construction site. When alcohol, how drunk you were, and how drunk you want to be are major focal points in your life, you have a drinking problem.

It is ironic that while you drink, you likely blast music by someone who probably died due to an overconsumption of alcohol and/or other drugs. The Doors, Led Zeppelin, Pink Floyd, Grateful Dead, Blind Melon, the list goes on. You'd think by now we'd get it. You'd think we'd understand the overconsumption of alcohol is bad. Actually, it's much worse than that. It's deadly.

By now, many of you have probably written me off as nothing more than a fool spouting off propaganda. I only wish I were. You've probably said to yourself, "Yeah, so, it's not me. I don't have a drinking problem." Well, maybe not. But dangerous habits such as alcohol abuse often develop in college. And maybe it is your friend, or someone else at that party who is cultivating a lifelong problem with alcohol. Or the kid you drove to the package store. Or maybe it was the kid in your building who died.

Jon Eaton

Are we as a society really that insecure as to make alcohol, a poison which allows us to retain absolutely nothing, the center of our lives? Do any of us really believe getting drunk every weekend is some sort of great rite of passage? Yeah, the passing of our lives right before our eyes — twice. It deeply disturbs me that we, as a generation, look to the bottom of a glass bottle for the answers to our problems. And what do we do when we don't find these answers? We make the bottle, and everything else around, as smashed as we are.

What alcohol does, when excessively consumed, is deteriorate the consumer, frustrate his or her loved ones, and leave family members to wonder forever what they would have, could have, should have done. While you drink excessively, you do two things: (1) anger sober neighbors and (2) endanger lives. I'm not saying alcohol kills everyone who touches it, but it certainly can kill you if you abuse it. And when you do drink so much that you can't talk, walk or contain any of your bodily fluids, you're abusing alcohol. When your blood is the color of spiced rum and your urine darker than the beer you're drinking, you have a drinking problem. So, will alcohol kill you? I don't know. But wouldn't you rather put the bottle down than find out?

I mentioned before that many of you have probably written me off. That's fine. Write me off all you want. But what will you have left after you've written everything off? Because that's what happens when you drink to excess. First, you blow off Monday and Friday classes, then into the middle of the week. Your grades begin to slip. Before you know it, you're out of school with a job that'll soon slip away the same way your education did. Next, it's your money, home and anyone close to you. After that, it's just you and a bottle. And you no longer care whether it's beer or screwdrivers or whiskey straight up, you just want your fix. You just need your fix. How are you going to get it tonight? Steal? Sell yourself?

Dramatized, maybe. But it's dramatized because I don't want any of you to end up face down in a gutter wondering where your life went, or afraid to sleep because you're not sure you'll wake up. Some of you are alcoholics. Some of you will die because of it. Few of us will escape this pain. But we all make our own choices. What's yours gonna be?

One of the seminal noise-rock bands of the late '80s, Pussy Galore made music so scuzzy, so raunchy, you almost need to take a bath after listening to it. Named after a character in the James Bond film Goldfinger, this Washington D.C. quartet created some of the most abrasive racket ever committed to tape. In other words, this is music best taken in small doses. Think of a (much) less cohesive Jesus Lizard.

After their demise in 1990, the band's members went on to form many interesting side projects and formal bands, including Boss Hog, The Jon Spencer Blues Explosion, Free Kitten and Royal Trux. Unfortunately, much of Pussy Galore's back catalog has remained out-of-print for years, save for the Corpse Love compilation which throws together a hodge podge of tracks scanning their career. To best appreciate Pussy Galore in all their dirty glory, one needs to hear them through their proper studio albums. Thankfully, Matador has finally released three of these works. While no single album is strong all the way through, each seems to have a running joke which makes for an interesting listening experience.

Led by bohemian hipster wannabe Jon Spencer, Pussy Galore's music was equal parts earnest avant-garde guitar noise and bullshit pose. Not surprisingly, any serious discussion of the band's musical attributes must completely ignore technical ability as they had none. Like Spencer's current outfit The Jon Spencer Blues Explosion, Pussy Galore had no bass, which means guitarists Julia Cafritz and Neil Hagerty constantly lock horns. Add ex-Sonic Youth drummer Bob Bert and his so-bad-it's-funny drumming and you've got yourself a curious sonic brew — to say the least.

The most amazing thing about Pussy Galore then, is that Voices speak through Walker

By Craig Schmidt
State News

EAST LANSING, Mich. (U-Wire) — If you believe Alice Walker, she doesn't have much to do with writing her critically and publicly acclaimed books.

Instead, she serves as a conduit for the voices of her characters and her ancestors, simply relating the stories and messages they inspire her to tell.

"You've got to go where the art takes you," she said. "And be aware of your own spirituality and how it propels us in art. My ancestors made it possible for me to do the art without worrying about the rest."

Walker, who spoke at the Wharton Center last week as part of the College of Arts and Letters' Celebrity Lecture Series, also participated in a colloquium in parlors B and C of the Union.

At the colloquium, the Pulitzer Prize-winning author of The Color Purple and The Temple of My Familiar, addressed an audience of nearly 200 people on topics as diverse as the nature of her creative processes and fruitful leisure activities.

Mostly, though, she talked about the mental and physical rigors of being a professional writer.

"Every time you write, there has to be a really dramatic shift in your life," she said. "You shed your life like a skin, whether that happens on the inside or the outside."

Jennifer Spano, a Kalamazoo resident who attended the lecture, said the vibrancy evident in Walker's writing also makes her an engaging speaker.

"She believes in the importance of her message, and knows the importance of it," Spano said. "That's why she can be so calm and easygoing, yet her message — in print and in spoken word — is still so forceful."

Walker is a smiling, diminutive woman whose conversational style masks the weight of her subject matter. In the past, she has drawn criticism for her portrayals of black men, and has campaigned against female genital mutilation.

Born a 54-year-old was born in Eatonton, Ga., and attended Sarah Lawrence College in New York. Her career as a professional writer began when she was an exchange student in Kenya.

"A great deal of my first book was written under a tree in Kenya," she said. "I spent a year or so there when I was in school. At the time, I had no idea it would become a book; I was helping build a school there. I became emotionally involved in the school and poems just started to bubble up."

Only recently, however, has she begun to talk about her feelings, instead of just writing them down.

"We were very fortunate to be able to get Alice Walker to speak," said Jo-Ann VandenBergh, executive staff assistant in the College of Arts and Letters. "For a long time she had not been accepting invitations, for whatever reason.

"Then, just recently, she started accepting invitations to talk about her craft. She has been at the top of our wish list for some time, and we are very pleased to have her."

But Walker's lack of activity on the speaker circuit didn't affect the ease of her delivery. During the 50-minute colloquium, Walker talked extensively about the characters in her books and how they have enabled her to turn writing into a career.

"I was working as an editor at Ms. magazine when I realized the characters in The Color Purple wanted to be heard," she said. "At the time, I was the only person at Ms. who had her own private office, but the characters just couldn't deal with it. I had to relocate so that they could speak.

"So I relocated, eventually settling in California. And the story came naturally."

Robin Williams filming at UC-Berkeley

By Norman Weiss
Daily Californian

BERKELEY, Calif. (U-Wire) — One day after winning an Academy Award, actor Robin Williams took his Oscar to UC Berkeley to film a movie, stunning the sparse number of people who decided to stay in town during spring break.

Williams was on campus last Tuesday through Thursday, filming the movie Patch Adams. His appearance on campus was marked by movie trucks, production crews and movie extras surrounding LeConte and Wheeler halls dressed in 1960s garb.

In the film, Williams portrays Patch Adams, a real-life medical doctor and clown famous for introducing humor into the healing process. Adams helped found the Gesundheit Institute in Virginia.

The portion of the movie filmed at UC Berkeley depicts the doctor as a medical student in the 1960s, speaking out in large lecture halls. Producers said it was not difficult to transform Wheeler Auditorium and 1 LeConte Hall into 1960s settings for the movie.

Williams said he chose to film at UC Berkeley because it is close to his San Francisco home.

"It's the most mellow place in the world," Williams said. "I've been going to Berkeley for years and nothing seems to change."

With many students gone for spring break, people who were on or around the barren campus said they were surprised to see the world-famous actor so far from Hollywood — especially at the height of his career. Last month, Williams won the best supporting actor Academy Award for his performance in the movie, Good Will Hunting — his first Oscar after three nominations.

Biking through Sproul Plaza two days after winning, Williams — sans Oscar — said that he still could not get over the fact that he received an award so momentous that it made him "speechless" when he won.

"I was in shock," Williams said. "I was truly surprised. It's nice. It's a great feeling. It's a medal that gives wood."

Everywhere the actor stopped, large crowds immediately formed. Near Sproul Hall, Williams was chatting with a homeless man when a crowd of 30 passers-by suddenly noticed the presence of Robin Williams. The crowd, which included the Italian media, mobbed Williams for his autograph and pictures. But Williams took it all in stride and took his time with his fans.

"You know the Free Speech Movement?" Williams asked. "It took place right over there and I'm looking at the results." Williams said as he posed for pictures they somehow managed to create some of the best trash rock around. And, thankfully, they had a wickedly twisted sense of humor. Witness the nihilistic cover of fellow noisemakers Einsturzende Neubauten's "Yü Gung" which highlights 1988's Sugarshit Sharp, an album filled with enough violent, chaotic noise to beat an eardrum into submission. It's an earful, for sure, but it's a lean album as far as length, which helps to rope in the band's signature traits with a minimum of panache.

Blessed by the best album title ever, Dial M For Motherfu—er is by and large more of the same, albeit in a slightly more cachaphonous manner as the other records. Lyrically, it's probably the most cynical as the hilarious "Undertaker" and "1 Hour Later" ably attest.

On the other hand, Right Now!, originally released in 1987, stands as Pussy Galore's finest album. A tour-de-force of thrashing and bashing, Right Now! is chock-full of snotty posing and arty indifference, accidentally setting a blueprint for much of the slackerdom that would soon dominate the indie world. Songs like "NYC: 1999!" give a glimpse of the direction Spencer would take with JSBX, with purposefully out-of-tune guitars and silly shout-along choruses. Truth be told, it's catchy as hell, but I don't think that was their goal.

Freaks for this kind of anti-rock will no doubt want to own all three albums, but for the casual listener who wants to hear the essence of Pussy Galore, Right Now! is where to start. Just don't forget to wear earplugs. Right Now! — A-. Sugarshit Sharp — B. Dial M For Motherfu—er — C (Marty Keane)

TRAMPOLINE
The Mavericks
MCA Nashville

While The Mavericks have always been top-notch country pop songwriters, there is nothing in their past like the consistent, eclectic excellence of their newest album, Trampoline. It is doubly amazing that the album comes from Nashville, the very same place that has been shipping out truckloads of robot songs by robot men in interchangable, comically large hats for years now.

The first thing The Mavericks have going for them is lead singer Raul Malo, whose silken tenor is one of the most gorgeous instruments in pop music today. His voice is so gorgeous in fact, that he doesn't just recall the ghosts of Roy Orbison and Elvis, he sings with them. To Malo's voice, The Mavericks add a healthy dose of everything — Cuban rhythms, pop melodies and even a sitar. A sitar! But the weird instrumentation never overwhelms the concise songwriting and the ace musicianship. The album is slicker than Teflon, but there is nothing false or overproduced. The large numbers were even recorded the hard way, with all the musicians together in the same room, even the string orchestra.

Trampoline is at once authentic and easy to love, already sure to be one of the finest albums of the year. From the first song, the bouncy horn-driven Cuban pop number "Dance the Night Away" to the last song, the spare, sad, soaring lullaby "Dream River," The Mavericks prove that music from Nashville can still be inventive and distinctive. A (Rob Roensch)

LEGACY: A TRIBUTE TO FLEETWOOD MAC'S RUMOURS
Various Artists
Atlantic/Lava

Here's a new twist on a tired concept: a tribute album comprised entirely of songs off one of rock's best-selling record's of all time. As is the case with so many of these tribute efforts, the idea itself is way more interesting than the results on Legacy: A Tribute to Fleetwood Mac's Rumours. One glance at the list of artists and i was scratching my head. For chrissakes, Elton John is sandwiched between Matchbox 20 and The Cranberries! As Hank Hill would say, "Whut the hell!"

The dubious selection of artists (it seems like someone went around begging to get these tracks recorded. How else could one explain having the insipid Sister Hazel cover "Gold Dust Woman?" Why not just put the ripping version Hole did a few years back on the album? Considering the fact that Mick Fleetwood himself sat behind the boards leads me to believe a certain someone is hard up for greenbacks.

John's cover of "Don't Stop," which is merely adequate, is one of the album's stronger moments. Not a good omen for any album, especially a Fleetwood Mac tribute. Simply put, this is an embarrassment to one of rock's most enduring acts. D– (M.K.)

ONE BY ONE
Agents of Good Roots
RCA

One By One is a fairly decent album considering that nothing much is expected from it. Although the album on a whole is by no means excellent, the 12 tracks on One By One is better than most of the generic bluegrass rock produced today.

Agents of Good Roots' main strong suit is their instrumentation. Guitarist/vocalist/songwriter Andrew Winn, bassist Stewart Myers, saxophonist J.C. Kuhl and drummer Brian Jones are great musicians in their own right. The talented band, along with Winn's vocals are enough to carry the album. However, Winn's songwriting leaves something to be desired. The lyrics are rather bland, creating safe, radio-ready songs as produced (overproduced, rather for music of this type) by Paul Fox.

Agents of Good Roots are at their best when the music takes center stage, giving its audience above average blues- influenced rock. B (Kevin Monahan)

WINTERLAND
Emma Townshend
EastWest

Emma Townshend's debut album Winterland sounds like one long song that only pauses every now and again for chord changes. Actually, I kept listening to her songs, waiting for the moment when she would just lash out and stretch her vocal chords to the very limit like so many solo female artists do these days. But that moment never came. Instead, the same caressing voice echoed back accompanied by piano and drums and an occasional guitar.

I think that Townshend is really trying to convey different emotions through her songs but whether she's singing about someone's "bitchy little comments" on "Five-A-Side Football" or "all the people having picnics, having fun" on "The Ladder," it's all pretty much the same melody, the same tempo, and the same eerie voice preaching about anger, fear, sadness and joy.

Winterland is good, but it gets a little boring and somewhat drawn out. However, if you're looking to relax after a long hard day or you're in the mood for a quiet night at home, then this album would suit you fine. C (Alexandria Lipka)

CLARA THOMAS
Clara Thomas
Mercury

Just when you thought it was safe to go outside, Alanis Morrisette sound-alikes have once again hit the market — so, let's meet Scandanavia's rendition, Clara Thomas. OK?

Alanis has unintentionally built a bad reputation for herself due to an immense media overload, and her music is not "too bad." But with her upcoming album, and a corresponding single on the City of Angels soundtrack, another sound-alike has surfaced — and they're not "too bad," either.

Lead singer Clara Lieberath and keyboardist Thomas Li combine with guitarist Kasper Soderlund to create a "good" effort — believe me, as opposed to "outstanding," folks. Expectations of a more slick, Euro-pop manifestation of the Alanis sound diffuse in the strong beginning of "The Girl With Strawberry Lips," complete with strong slide guitar played by Soderlund, with "Automatic Feeling" hardening the edge of this release nicely.

The next two songs, "Whop Da Da Doh" and "Fishes," nauseate with, yes, a harmonica in the former song, but overall, the strength of the CD is in the middle portion. Starting off with "You Were Never Wrong," a haunting piece with spots of heavily reverbed vocals, the creative pace picks up with the next five tracks.

All and all, this is a "good" release, and you can't beat the use of a Dobro guitar which highlights a variety of tracks. Just not outstanding. B– (Jorma Kansanen)

REBEKAH
Remember To Breathe
Elektra

In contrast to Clara Thomas, a much stronger, and more original, rock voice and presence emanates from this release.

It is a strange adjective to use to describe a rock singer, but Rebekah's voice is "smooth," while being rhythm and blues influenced but not contrived. A future star might be on the horizon, but I must emphasize "might be."

The two pre-prescribed singles in "Hey Genius" and "Sin So Well" start this release off well, with the standard rock mix of distorted guitars (the former song) and acoustic- tinged riffs (the latter song). To throw the listener totally off, the title track opens with a haunting, spacy feel, and showcases Rebekah's ability to hit to all musical genres.

After a sadly poignant "Love Song," the next track, "I Wish I Could Believe Me," is the strongest rocker on the album and issues in a trio of songs that lean to the darker side of Rebekah's song writing. On "Be Your Own," the singer-songwriter let's her lover know that "baby maybe stop trying to be my man, and start being your own."

Ouch. That's got to hurt.

And, there is not much that hurts on this release, except for a pace that sometimes gets the listener lost but not ship- wrecked. Yes, it is a tad bit unimaginative at times, but Rebekah "might be" here to stay. B+ (J.K.)

THE PRINCETON REVIEW

Hanging with rapper Vanilla Ice

By Corey Moss
Iowa State Daily

COLUMBIA, Mo. (U-Wire) — It is not everyday when a man has the opportunity to meet one of his heroes, so when Vanilla Ice's manager confirmed my interview a week ago, you can imagine my excitement.

"So did you meet Vanilla or did you hang with Vanilla?" a friend of mine asked me Sunday morning, hours after the Ice Man's performance at The Blue Note in Columbia, Mo.

"Oh, I definitely hung," I said.

"How do you know?" he asked.

I guess I don't really know how, but I do know that Vanilla Ice's friends call him Rob.

I know he picked Kentucky to win the NCAA tournament (must be because Miami didn't make it in).

I know Vanilla does things his way or no way.

I know he drives the rental car from the club to the hotel, while his crew rides in the back seat.

And most importantly, I know Vanilla Ice remembers my name.

The plan was to be at The Blue Note by 5 p.m. to watch the sound check and sit down with Vanilla for a 30-minute interview.

I arrived in Columbia at 4 p.m. At 4:30, I had a beer to calm my nerves and at 4:32, I had another.

It was the day I had been dreaming about since I was 13. In the last week, I had run through interview questions in my mind hundreds of times and by Friday, had 25 of the most polished questions of my journalism career.

I arrived at the club at precisely 5 p.m., only to find that Vanilla and his crew were not in town yet. Already, my interview was looking shaky.

Josh, the promoter of the show who looked no older than me, was nervous. I felt his pain.

I picked up a copy of The Muneater, the University of Missouri's school paper, to pass time. What the hell is a muneater, I remember thinking. Maybe I'll ask Vanilla after I ask him what a roni is.

At 6:15 p.m., the Vanilla Ice Posse (yep, yep, that's what V.I.P. stands for) pulled up to the club. The soundcheck minus Ice took almost 30 minutes.

"Someone get Rob," Vanilla's manager said.

"The game is still on," DJ Zero said.

"I guarantee Ice ain't comin' out until it's over."

So, there is less than two hours before the show is supposed to start, and the only thing coming between me and Vanilla Ice is a basketball game.

It could be worse. Like if the game were to go into overtime, which — of course — it did.

Vanilla finally made it to the stage, where he picked up a microphone, rapped two verses, set it down and completely rearranged the mix the sound guy just spent 30 minutes on.

"We're running out of time and we still have to get Ice back to the hotel to get ready for the show," his manager said. "The TV station is doing a quick interview with him in a few minutes, you can ask him a few questions then or we can do something after the show."

I opted for the post-show interview.

After a casual conversation with the Ice Man, which I think went something like, "What's up?" "Not much, man," Vanilla sat down for the TV interview.

Mr. TV guy, a complete and utter tool, shot his first question, the obvious: "What can people expect tonight?"

The second question was a rewording of the first, and the third question a rewording of the second. Twice during the interview, Vanilla said the words "like I said."

During question three, Ice glanced at me as I rolled my eyes at Mr. TV guy. He chuckled and answered the question. I was in.

After question four and another short answer from Vanilla, Mr. TV guy desperately turned around to me and another newspaper guy and actually asked if we had any questions for him (and Missouri is supposed to be one of the best journalism schools in the country?).

I shook my head with a grin on my face that said "There is no way in hell I am letting you steal one of my pro questions."

After TV guy was finished making a fool out of himself, Ice and his posse headed for their hotel.

An hour later, to a monstrous chant of "Ice Ice Baby" by a sold-out crowd of over 1,000 fans, Vanilla took the stage.

Ironically, Ice opened with "Fame," a song from his 1994 record "Mind Blowin'" about how the media ruined his life.

In between freestyle chants like "Show me the money," "Down with o.p.p.," and "This is how we do it" (no "Can't touch this"), Vanilla rapped through several "Mind Blowin'" tunes, including the pot-promoting "Roll 'Em Up."

Ice "kicked it old school" with an extended version of "Havin' A Roni" in which he amazingly simulated scratching a record with his voice.

Portions of "Play That Funky Music" and "Stop That Train" were used to tease the crowd, but the only other "To The Extreme" song Vanilla played was a phenomenal 10-minute version of "Ice Ice Baby."

The show ended years too early, and with my adrenaline at an all-time high, I headed backstage for my interview.

Vanilla's manager had set up a table behind the back curtain and my hero was standing next to it. This was the big moment.

As I walked over to the table with questions in hand, the stage curtain began to go up. Vanilla's bodyguards, who stood onstage the entire show, noticed the curtain raining and raced Ice out the door.

I followed and the manager assured me we would figure out a way to do the interview.

While small-talking with Ice in the alley behind the club about the dumbass who brought the curtain up, a mob of fans spotted him and rushed to his car.

Adding a strange but flattering twist to the night, a group of high school girls standing nearby pointed at me and asked each other "Is that him?" Another approached me and asked "Are you Vanilla Ice's brother?"

Vanilla kept with the words he declared so boldly in his 1991 book by "keeping it all about the fans." He signed over 40 autographs as his manager and I came to the conclusion that a phone interview would be our only solution.

After making a few arrangements, the posse loaded into the car. Ice looked at me standing close by and said "Later, Corey." He stepped down into the car and before I could start breathing again, he was gone.

"Later, Corey." Two simple words. Yet, by far the coolest thing anyone has ever said to me.

and pointed at Sproul Hall.

For senior Anna Vasquez, a routine trip to work in Wheeler Hall was transformed into a five-minute chatting session with the actor. She was walking down one of the halls when she noticed the long catering tables, the extras and Williams sitting at the end of the table with his golden statue.

"I looked at him and I said, 'Is it you?,' and he said, 'Yeah, it's me,' and everybody started laughing," Vasquez said.

Even local businesses were not free of the frenzy that seemed to accompany the actor. Edward Woo, an assistant manager at Foot Locker on Telegraph Avenue, said that Williams' presence in the store almost created a security hazard when 30 people rushed in the store for the celebrity's autograph.

Woo, who helped Williams purchase New Balance running shoes, said that he got caught up in the moment even though he was doing his job.

"I did get excited," Woo said. "I can't believe I helped him."

After Williams left, Woo called his manager to tell him the news, but his boss would not believe him. Woo said, however, that he has the credit card receipt to prove it.

Men's tennis heads for home

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

Heading down the homestretch, all appears to be in order for the Massachusetts men's tennis team.

The Minutemen have improved their overall record 11-6 (5-5 spring), with two recent victories.

UMass soundly defeated Seton Hall 6-1 last Friday, and then trounced Fairfield on Monday afternoon by the same count.

"These were wins we had to have," Massachusetts tennis coach Judy Dixon said. "It is understandable that we lost to some quality opponents this spring, but we felt we should beat these teams."

The Minutemen were successful in five of six singles matches against the Pirates. No. 1 Todd Cheney was the lone victim as he fell to Bavor Barsnic, 3-6, 3-6.

Rob Manchester was triumphant at No. 2 by easing past Todd Green, 6-0, 6-2. Alex Aller, the lone senior, knocked off Mark Vanderlest, 7-6, 6-1.

"It is great to see Alex peaking at the end of his career here," Dixon said. "It is great for him and the team as well."

Parsa Samii continued to impress at No. 4, as he rolled over Lou Castelli, 6-0, 6-2. Kevin Curley and Ryan Gately were straight set victors at Nos. five and six.

"The Seton Hall match was a nice team effort," Dixon said. "The guys came out and took care of business."

It was more of the same on Monday, as the Minutemen returned home to battle a local foe, Fairfield.

UMass had dominated the series with the Stags, having won all 10 previous encounters. The trend held for this meeting, as the Minutemen simply overpowered Fairfield in just about every match.

With the exception of No. 6 Ryan Gately, all the UMass singles players captured their matches. No. 2 Rob Manchester was extended to three sets to gain the win.

"We have had a nice string of matches in a row now, and we need to keep winning," Manchester said. "The most important thing now is to be ready physically for the Atlantic 10 tournament."

The tournament will take place on April 17-19 at Blacksburg, Va. The site happens to be the home of the conference's strongest team, Virginia Tech.

The Hokies are currently ranked in the Top 40, and figures to be the heavy favorite. UMass will be looking to fit in at the four spot.

"We continue to move up in the conference," Dixon said. "That is something that is really important for the program as we continue to push for the next level of play."

UMass will conclude the regular season this afternoon against Tufts at the upper Boyden courts.

The match will serve as Senior Day, as Alex Aller will play his last home match for UMass.

"I am so proud of Alex and what he has accomplished here," Dixon said. "He has been an integral member of the team and a great person as well."

Jay Negus and the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will square off against national power Loyola on Saturday afternoon at 4 p.m. at Johns Hopkins University.

Evans takes over reins at Arizona State; Lipinski makes the decision to turn pro

PHOENIX (AP) — Rob Evans, who turned Mississippi's faltering basketball program into a Southeastern Conference power, will tackle another rebuilding job with Arizona State.

Evans was introduced yesterday as the Sun Devils' 12th head coach at a 2:30 p.m. EDT news conference.

The Associated Press learned Monday night that Evans and Arizona State athletic director Kevin White agreed to terms. Evans returned to Oxford, Miss., to tell his players, then caught an early flight back to Arizona.

"He said they really didn't react one way or the other," Ole Miss athletic director Pete Boone said of Evans' meeting with the players.

When Boone asked Evans what the overriding factor in his decision to go the Pac-10 school, the coach told him "it was just a gut feeling and probably the location as much as anything."

Evans is a native of Hobbs, N.M., where his parents still live. Evans will replace Don Newman, who took over as interim coach after Bill Frieder resigned under pressure last September.

Newman took over a 10-20 team with only eight scholarship players and the Sun Devils finished this season at 18-14 with an NIT bid, developing a devoted following among Sun Devils boosters. But White was after a bigger name, starting with Utah coach Rick Majerus.

After Majerus rejected a reported $1 million offer from Arizona State last Tuesday, White and a search committee met with Evans. At Ole Miss, he coached junior guard Michael White, Kevin White's son.

"The key thing about Rob Evans is that Kevin White feels very, very comfortable with him," said Frieder, who remains close to the basketball program. "You know, Kevin has known him for a long time. Kevin's son was recruited by Rob, and so that gave Kevin a lot of time to observe, evaluate and develop a friendship with Rob. He's seen what Rob has done rebuilding the Mississippi program."

Evans was 86-81 at Mississippi, but his last two teams were a combined 42-16 with back-to-back SEC West titles and NCAA tournament berths.

Lipinski to turn pro

BALTIMORE (AP) — Olympic champion Tara Lipinski intends to become a professional figure skater so she can spend less time training and more time with her family.

"Now I'll have four-day weekends and be able to be with my family because they mean so much to me," she said yesterday. "I don't want to be 21 and not know my dad."

As a pro, Lipinski would be ineligible for amateur competitions and would need to receive reinstatement as an amateur to skate in the 2002 Olympics in Salt Lake City. Reinstatement by skating authorities would not pose a problem.

"I would love to go to the 2002 Olympics and try to win another gold," she said, but added that she would feel "almost a little greedy in doing that, especially to my parents, who have given up so much."

Lipinski spoke on NBC's "Today" show from Baltimore, where she is to perform tonight in a figure skating show.

"I think now, I'm going to go pro," said Lipinski, who at 15 won the title at Nagano, making her the youngest individual gold medalist in her sport. "And for one major reason, I think — I really miss being home with my dad.

"I realized after Nagano how important it is to me to be with my mom and dad and be all together and have fun and go out to dinner and really be a family again."

She said her training schedule in Detroit kept her from spending much time with her family at home in Sugar Land, Texas. She also said she'd like to go to college.

"I owe that to my parents and myself," she said, "I've accomplished my dream. I think I need to give something back to them, so we can be a family again and really have that connection."

Reds fall to San Diego, 3-2

SAN DIEGO (AP) — Carlos Hernandez tied the score with a two-out, two-run homer in the ninth, and Greg Vaughn hit a sacrifice fly in the 10th as the San Diego Padres won their home opener, 3-2 yesterday over the Cincinnati Reds.

Tony Gwynn singled off Jeff Shaw (0-1) leading off the 10th. One out later, Joyner singled to send Gwynn to third. Vaughn followed with his fly to left, and Gwynn scored standing up.

Trevor Hoffman (2-0) allowed one hit in the 10th as the Padres beat the Reds for the third time in four games this season. It was the third time in their first seven games that the Padres staged a late comeback.

Pete Harnisch, making his first appearance in San Diego since a nightmarish opening day with the New York Mets a year ago, shut out the Padres through eight, allowing just four hits.

But Shaw, who has saved all three of the Reds' wins this year, let the Padres tie it in the ninth. Wally Joyner hit a one-out single and Hernandez, in his first year as the Padres' starting catcher, hit the first pitch he saw from Shaw into the first row of the seats in left-center field.

San Diego then loaded the bases on two walks and a single before Steve Finley popped up to shortstop Barry Larkin, activated from the 15-day disabled list before the game.

It was Harnisch's first appearance in San Diego since April 1, 1997, when he allowed three consecutive homers as the Padres launched an 11-run rally in the sixth — a modern-day NL record for runs in an inning on opening day — in a 12-5 win over the Mets. That was Harnisch's only appearance for the Mets before going on the disabled list with insomnia and anxiety. He was traded to Milwaukee on Aug. 30.

Harnisch has two no-decisions against the Padres this season. Last Wednesday, he allowed homers to Ken Caminiti and Finley as San Diego rallied from five runs down to beat the Reds 10-9 in Cincinnati.

San Diego's Joey Hamilton, the winner of that game, fell behind 2-0 in the first inning yesterday after allowing RBI singles by Eduardo Perez and Reggie Sanders on consecutive pitches.

Jones seals the deal for Tigers; Devil Rays fall prey to Detroit

DETROIT (AP) — Todd Jones was a man on a mission. He had hockey tickets and didn't want to be late.

Jones, Detroit's saves leader with a career-high 31 last season, earned his first of 1998 with a perfect ninth inning yesterday as the Tigers beat the Tampa Bay Devil Rays, 3-1 in their home opener. The win, sparked by the hitting of Brian Hunter and some aggressive baserunning by Luis Gonzalez, ended a five-game losing streak, which matched the Tigers' longest of 1997.

"I had felt absolutely useless until today," Jones said. "I mean, I want to go out and contribute. Plus, I've got third-row tickets at the hockey game.

Jones said Mike Ilitch, who owns both the Tigers and the NHL's Red Wings, gave him the tickets.

"If I'd blown it, I don't know, maybe he'd come and snatch back the tickets," Jones said with a laugh.

But it was no laughing matter for the Devil Rays, 4-2 through their first six games and trying to become just the third expansion team to start 5-2. Tampa Bay stranded 13 runners, including eight by Bubba Trammell.

"Both teams left runners on base," said Tampa Bay's Kevin Stocker, who had a triple and two singles from the ninth slot. "But we had the opportunities, and that's what you need is opportunities. We're going to win a lot of games if we keep getting those opportunities."

Trammell, who played for Detroit in the Tigers' 1997 home opener, struck out for Tampa Bay in the first and third, leaving the bases loaded each time. He fanned for the second out with runners at first and second in the seventh.

"The only thing that struck me about the change of uniforms was how I hit in this ballpark," Trammell said. "It didn't change anything. Last year, I think I hit about .140 here and .280 on the road."

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

will be junior attack Laura Korutz, who has scored six goals in her last two games, three against Brown and three more at UConn. That gave the team's leading scorer 17 for the season and 20 points overall.

If the game happens to go down to the wire, the Minutewomen may call upon sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick, who had the game-winning goal in last Wednesday's win over Brown. Pavlick follows Korutz on the scoring list, with eight goals and 11 points.

The younger players have played a crucial role on the team thus far and players such as freshman attack Fay Naber and freshmen goaltenders Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi will look to continue their contributions. Sophomore midfielder Sara MacNabb and freshman attack Kara DePaula also got into the scoring act in the win over UConn, and will look to build upon that in upcoming games.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You can enjoy repeating a past success today, but you mustn't allow yourself to get lost in the memories of what only seems a better time.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Now is not the time to test the waters of something new when you have an old, familiar project to work on yet. First things first!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You are feeling unusually affectionate today, and you may surprise a loved one with your willingness to tend to his or her every whim.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Your generosity is likely to be matched today by that of a Scorpio native. Together, you should be able to produce a great deal!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be considering a relationship change, but you don't want to appear at all fickle to those who constantly have their eyes on you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — This is a good day to prove to others that you have what it takes to stick with it and go the distance. The question of how can be answered easily.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be feeling as though others do not respect you as much as they should. Do not demand what you're not getting; try harder to earn it.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Your social life is about to pick up, and today you'll have a chance to get ahead on important projects in order to free up a few evenings.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You needn't be submissive today, nor must you try to be domineering in any way. Strive to achieve a new equality with friends.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Your pride may not allow you to overlook even the slightest offense today, but you must take care that your reactions are not out of proportion.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — You are in the mood to be a little more showy and stylish than usual, and you may have the opportunity after dark to strut your stuff.

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — You mustn't tease others today, for you will very likely take your own joking too far. You don't know when to say when at this time.

Samela, Clark power UMass over Huskies, 12–6

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

There is a reason why they play nine innings in a baseball game.

It is for those days like yesterday, when Massachusetts spotted Connecticut three runs in the top of the first inning, and subsequently watched leadoff hitter Shaun Skeffington get picked off of first base in the bottom of the frame.

It is for those days when a pitcher can struggle early, but rebound to put things together, like UMass freshman Nick Skirkanich did against UConn.

Massachusetts	12
Connecticut	6

Trailing 3-0, UMass quickly erupted for four runs in the bottom of the frame, highlighted by a bases-clearing double by catcher Brian Samela, and spotted their rookie hurler a 4– 3 lead. Skirkanich then settled down to allow only one more run in his next six innings of work, and the Minutemen offense came through once again to propel the hosts to a 12– 6 victory over UConn.

"It didn't start off good, but we came back. Nick pitched well out there and got some confidence. We knew that we had to go nine innings, and that's a long game with our team," said Samela, who finished 3–for–5 with three RBI.

"[When Nick came in after the first inning] I told him that he had to concentrate on every hitter. That's something that you can get away with in high school, but not here in college," Massachusetts coach Mike Stone said. "But he settled down and pitched a great game. It's important for not only him, but all of our freshmen to do that."

After scoring single runs in the second and fourth innings, UConn trimmed the UMass lead to 6–4 with a run of its own in the top of the sixth.

Then the Minutemen opened the floodgates in the bottom of the frame.

Skeffington started the inning with a double to the right– center field gap. Third baseman Bryan Mazzaferro followed with a base on balls, and Muchie Dagliere loaded the bases when UConn pitcher Al Bundy booted a sacrifice bunt by the UMass second baseman, who extended his hitting streak to 19 games with a single in the first inning.

Doug Clark then came through with a bases–clearing double of his own, upping the Minutemen lead to 9–4. Aaron Braunstein made it 10–4 with a single through a drawn–in infield, and Steve Asadoorian closed out the five– run inning with a fielder's choice which brought home Braunstein, who had moved to second on a single by Samela.

"This was a big game today. We went down there last week and got embarrassed. We wanted to come out and show them that we weren't the kind of team that they played against last week," said Clark, who drove in five runs. "There really aren't any holes in our lineup. All of the guys have the potential to hurt you, so you can't pitch around anyone. That means we get a lot of quality pitches to swing at."

Braunstein would later add his first home run of the year, while UConn added a pair of runs to make it a 12-6 final.

"Things started out rough out there, but we came back. This was a great win for us because we lost to them last week," said Skirkanich, who earned his first collegiate victory. "It's great to have such a great hitting team and a good defense behind me, because it picks me up and makes my job a lot easier."

"This was a mirror image of last week's game. Last time we spaced out our hits and they got them in bunches. Today it was the opposite," Stone said. "We made some things happen today. But now we've got to be ready for Central Connecticut tomorrow, because they are a good team."

The Minutemen will go up against CCSU tomorrow at 3 p.m. in New Britain, Conn. Freshman Craig Szado will get the ball for his first collegiate start against the Blue Devils.

Brian Samela had three hits and three RBI in a 12–6 victory over UConn yesterday afternoon.

For UMass, change in latitude equals change in game's results

By Kathleen Rolls

It was nearly a mirror image of their last matchup a week ago for the Massachusetts and Connecticut baseball teams. Except this time the reflection was a little more attractive for the Minutemen, as they avenged their 11–5 loss, and won, 12–6, yesterday at Earl E. Lorden Field.

In the last affair, UMass dotted the scorecard with 12 hits, none of which the Minutemen could mesh together to formulate more than three runs, as they stranded 10 runners. The Huskies, on the other hand, had no trouble providing the timely hits to sink the Minutemen. Muchie Dagliere went 3–for–5 with a pair of doubles while Brian Samela and Aaron Braunstein both went 2–for–4 with an RBI apiece, but it just wasn't enough.

"When we went down there last week we were embarrassed," centerfielder Doug Clark said. "We wanted to show them that we weren't that type of club, we just didn't execute [last week]."

In the first inning of yesterday, UConn slapped UMass with a three–run deficit as freshman pitcher Nick Skirkanich struggled, letting up three hits and walking two. But his team provided the backup as it topped the Huskies with four runs in the bottom of the same inning, smacking three hits and forcing two errors off senior pitcher Mike Galati and his team. Galati failed to find his groove, only completing one inning while giving up five runs.

Skirkanich calmed down after the first inning, hurling seven innings and allowing just four runs while striking out seven. UConn tallied eight hits but could not find the breakthrough it needed to make a comeback, as the Minutemen continued to mount their lead.

"I told him that he needed to concentrate on every single pitch after the first inning," Massachusetts coach Mike Stone said. "But Nick settled down and pitched a great game."

Opportunity knocked more than once for UMass as the Minutemen scored four runs in the first, and five runs in the sixth. Muchie Dagliere extended his longest career hitting streak of 19 games with a single to right field in the first inning in which he eventually scored. Doug Clark drove in five runs on a 2–for–5 day, and Aaron Braunstein delivered his first homer on the season. Eight of the nine players got at least one hit, including five extra–base hits.

"It's great to have a great hitting team behind you," Skirkanich said. "It made my job easy and it was a great win for us."

UConn was not able to recover, though the Huskies posted a two–run rally in the eighth inning. Their four pitchers failed to deceive the UMass hitters, as they gave up 12 hits, five walks, and managed to hit Matt Wolcott twice.

For Samela, it was for personal reasons to come out and perform as well as he did. The native of Cheshire, Conn. was originally recruited by Huskies coach Andy Baylock, but was eventually tossed to the side as Baylock found he didn't need another catcher at the time. Instead, Samela opted for UMass.

Yesterday's game also marked the first time Samela caught for a fellow Cheshire native, freshman Skirkanich.

"It's nice to play well and beat the coach who didn't want me," Samela said. "[Skirkanich] was a freshman when I was a senior, so I never got to play with him."

What comes out of all this is while the pitching is still a mixed bag of experience and freshmen jitters, the hitting has been providing the balancing medium for the team. Prior to yesterday's game, UMass was hitting a monstrous .340 as a team and averaging over 10 runs per game.

"I don't see too many holes in the lineup, and there's speed and power everywhere," Clark said. "Every pitcher we face has to throw quality pitches to every hitter in our lineup."

Same story for pitchers against CCSU

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The pursuit of "perfection" could definitely be considered one of the most futile endeavors of the human mindset.

Sometimes, that is.

Yesterday afternoon in New Britain, Conn., senior Liz Wagner pitched a perfect game against Central Connecticut for the Massachusetts softball team (20–11, 7–1 in Atlantic 10), and the Minutewomen easily took the 8–0 game for themselves.

If the pursuit of perfection can not be achieved, near perfection could also be considered a futile endeavor.

However, that congruent point has already been nullified.

Wagner had a "no–hit" precedent set for her in the first game of the double-header against the Lady Blue Devils (0–10), as junior Danielle Henderson threw a no–hitter in a not– quite–as–immense–ly dominating 6–0 win.

Sheer domination over this team from a city known more for it's Minnesota Twins' Double A affiliate, or the Stanley hardware factory, is not new for UMass. This performance marks the second straight season the Minutewomen have held CCSU hitless in a doubleheader, after UMass did a double–take as well last season in a twin–bill on April 7.

Massachusetts	8

Who were the pitchers in that doubleheader?

Of course, Henderson and Wagner.

For Henderson, it was a case of déja vu — all over again.

"After Liz had finished her warmups, I said to her, 'do you realize that this was the same team we no-hit last year,'" Henderson said. "If I didn't have two walks in my game, we would have had two perfect games.

"This performance kind of psyches us up for this weekend [two double headers against Rhode Island and North Carolina], especially after that loss to Dayton on Sunday. We needed this one."

The perfect game for Wagner was the first of her career, and her second career no–hitter. This has been a transitional season for Wagner, as the Sidney, N.Y. native has been sharing the No. 2 role on the pitching staff with freshman Carrie Jefferies, while also seeing time in the designated hitter spot in the lineup.

No–hitters are beginning to become second–hand material for Henderson, and this is the third no–hitter she has thrown in nine starts, and the sixth of her career. The Commack, N.Y. product no–hit Michigan State on March 15, and also threw a perfect game against Fordham on March 29.

Danielle Henderson

After junior Mandy Galas scored on a throwing error in the first inning, the Minutewomen took a 2–0 lead on senior Kim Gutridge's RBI single in the first game of the afternoon. Wagner combined with freshman Anne Smith for a pair of RBI singles in the fifth inning, with Gutridge scoring on a throwing error after her triple.

Freshman Debbie Tomiguchi rounded out the scoring in the first game with a RBI single in the sixth inning.

In the second game, senior Tracy Osier dabbled in some perfection herself, going 3–for–3 with something as rare as a perfect game — a infield double. After Gutridge scored Galas on a fielder's choice in the first inning, UMass put three runs on the board in the third inning with the help of two Lady Blue Devil errors.

The Minutewomen plated three more runs in the fourth inning, with another déjà vu (all over again) experience occurring with Gutridge on a RBI on a fielder's choice. Junior Becky George's sacrifice fly finished off the fourth inning scoring, and Galas' bloop single in the fifth officially invoked the mercy rule in the 8–0 win.

Minutewoman Notes: Henderson earned her first career hit in the second game doing pinch-hit duty... the third team All–American has not yielded a earned run in her last 91.1 innings of work, dating back to Feb. 26, and has registered double–digit strikeout totals in her last 12 starts, good for 202 Ks on the season.

Playoff spots still open in NHL; coaches can make the difference

Michael Kobylanski on the NHL

And down the stretch they come...

Yes, it is crunch time for all National Hockey League teams in the playoff hunt (which is pretty much everyone but Tampa Bay). There are some teams that are battling just to make the post–season, while others are trying to clinch home–ice advantage and a high seed for the playoffs.

• The majority of the University of Massachusetts student body is probably in good spirits right now. After all, the home–state Bruins have been one of the league's biggest surprises in 1997–98, and sit right in the thick of things in the Eastern Conference.

You need not to sit in wonder and try to comprehend how Pat Burns has pulled this off. The answer is simple: he gets the most out of every one of his players.

The Black and Gold are not a team laden with All–Stars and Olympians. They are a young team with a veteran coach — one that knows how to win hockey games. Forget about the days with Steve Kasper behind the bench. Burns provides stability for the Bruins, and with a young nucleus of players in place, this could represent the beginning of a new saga in the storied history of the Bruins.

• The mirror image of the B's in the Western Conference has been the Los Angeles Kings, and the fact that they play 3,000 miles away from us makes them seem even more unrecognizable. Once again, the situation is the same: a young team with few top notch players.

However, things are different behind the bench. Larry Robinson still is a youngster himself as far as coaching experience. Regardless, after a playing career which saw him etch his name at one of the most solid defensemen of all– time, you would just figure that the man knows a little bit about hockey.

And I would say that he does. In fact, from all of the awards and Stanley Cups that the former backliner took home, it's safe to say that Robinson is a winner. And now the Kings are becoming winners too.

• Then there are the teams that are still knocking on the door. Carolina and San Jose are still alive after starting the month of April in impressive fashion. The Hurricanes shut out New Jersey 4–0 last Wednesday (another prime example why the Devils needed to get another offensive threat at the trading deadline) and downed Boston on Monday night. With those wins, the former Whalers are only two points behind Ottawa for the final playoff spot.

Hurricanes goalie Trevor Kidd may have said it best when he said that the spot will probably go to whatever team buckles first. The Senators appear to be holding their ground after a 1–0 win over Buffalo on Sunday night.

Sorry Trevor, all of us Whalers fans know all about the failed last–minute playoff surges that end up just short. I hope that I'm wrong, but this year appears to be no different.

As far as the Sharks, I left them for dead a few weeks ago, but they are back. They actually pulled ahead of Edmonton the other night, but are now two points behind the Oilers after the Alberta pucksters beat Vancouver.

Goaltending will be the key for the Sharks, as Mike Vernon will do his best to single–handedly lead San Jose to the playoffs. Still, I don't see any miracles happening again this year (like they did when S.J. shocked Detroit in the playoffs a few years ago). But hey, at least these guys can work on their tan in sunny California.

• The top dogs are even trying to get into the act out West. Dallas leads Detroit by two points for the No. 1 seed. However, the funny thing in all of this is that St. Louis may end up with a lower seed than Colorado even though they have more points than the Avalanche.

Somehow the rule that gives the division winners the top two seeds regardless of their number of points doesn't seem as justified anymore. Oh well.

• I had to stand up and cheer for the all–out brawl in the Islanders/Rangers game over the weekend. However, Rangers backup goalie Dan Cloutier just totally kicked the tyou fill in the four–letter word] out of Tommy Salo of the Islanders. Salo looked like Cloutier's personal punching bag out there, as the Swede was tucked in the fetal position.

• Several teams can now be officially declared out of the playoff hunt, even though they still are mathematically alive.

First, the Rangers. You lost to the Islanders. Enough said.

Second, Anaheim. Scoring punch with Teemu Selanne, but not much else. If they only had Paul Kariya for a full year.

Next on the list: Florida. Get some offense and maybe you'll win some games.

Finally, Toronto and Vancouver. Polar opposites here. The Maple Leafs have no money or talent, while the Canucks should be battling Colorado for the Pacific Division crown, but aren't.

Oh well, there's always next year.

Lax to face Big Green

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will make a return to Ivy League play today when it hosts No. 12 Dartmouth (3–1) at 4 p.m. on Totman Field.

The Minutewomen won two of their three previous Ivy League matchups, the last coming against a solid Brown team which finally succumbed to UMass 8–7 in overtime.

What made the victory even sweeter was that the Minutewomen had something to prove after last year's season finale loss to the Bears— and they did just that. UMass (4–2) also defeated rival Harvard in its season opener, a 13–12 thriller that ended after going into double overtime. Their only loss to an Ivy Leaguer came against a deep Yale squad that used its speed and agility to put together some strong plays.

That gives the Minutewomen two wins against the Ivy, both coming in overtime periods. With UMass coming off two straight wins over Brown and Connecticut and Dartmouth being nationally ranked, today's contest could be very close. So far this season, that has meant an advantage for the Minutewomen, who have played outstanding defense in the extra periods.

Although UMass had a minor scare early in its game against regional rival UConn last weekend, the Minutewomen bounced back and dominated late as they sealed up a 15–4 road win. After a few shaky opening minutes saw the Huskies pull even at 3–3, UMass finished with an impressive 12–1 run.

The Minutewomen put together several crisp and well– timed passes and plays during that run and may need a similar performance for the duration of today's game. The Big Green are led by Jacque Weitzel and Emily Fenwick, who spearhead a solid attack for Dartmouth, leaving little room for error. UMass is certainly capable of playing that type of game, especially on its home field.

Last year, the Big Green came out on top and put away the visiting Minutewomen, 13–8, to increase their lead in the all–time series to two games (10–8). Now that UMass has entered the transitional phase in the rebuilding process though, many negative series records should start to reverse.

Hoping to continue that trend today

Greek rocket attack has officials on edge

ATHENS, Greece (AP) — A rocket attack on a Citibank branch in Athens early yesterday sent out much wider tremors: fears of a return of the deadly and elusive November 17 terrorist group. "It's their way of saying, 'We're back, we haven't forgotten, so don't forget about us,'" said Maria Bossi, former head of a committee formed to fight Greek terrorism.

No one claimed responsibility for the anti-tank missile attack, which caused extensive damage but no injuries.

But it carried all the hallmarks of November 17, which has been silent since the slaying of a Greek shipyard owner 11 months ago. November 17 is the only terrorist group in Greece known to use rockets. It often waits days before claiming responsibility for an attack.

Some officials didn't wait for a declaration to put the blame on November 17, whose litany of violence and 22 killings dates back to the murder of the CIA station chief in 1975.

"All the evidence points to November 17," police subcommander Yiannis Giorgopoulos said.

Police worry that Greece's oldest and most feared terrorist cell could begin a new round of attacks. There was also concern about the target: a high-profile American company

Amtrak accused of racism by employees

WASHINGTON (AP) — Eight black Amtrak employees and their union sued the passenger railroad yesterday, accusing it of racial harassment and discrimination.

The lawsuit, also joined by a former Amtrak worker and a rejected applicant, accuses the company of hiring too few blacks, denying promotional opportunities to those hired and subjecting them to harsher discipline than their white counterparts.

"At Amtrak, African-American men and women are passed over for jobs, are passed over for training and are passed over for promotion," charged Anthony D. Rochon, a regional vice chairman with the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees.

Amtrak spokesman Cliff Black said the company was surprised by the lawsuit. He said Amtrak promptly investigates reports of discrimination and harassment and initiates disciplinary proceedings when appropriate.

"Amtrak has a zero-tolerance policy for any discriminatory practices either in hiring, promotion or the work place," he said. "Amtrak has always worked hard to make sure its hiring and promotional practices are fair and equitable for all applicants and employees."

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court here, does not seek specific damages, but plaintiffs' lawyers estimated it would take $100 million to cover lost wages, mental anguish, attorneys' fees and punitive damages.

Harvey & Jolly elected to seats on Select Board

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Bryan Harvey and Dolly Jolly won Select Board seats, and two University of Massachusetts students became Town Meeting representatives in Tuesday's Amherst town elections.

Harvey, an incumbent Select Board member, coasted into his third term with 1,703 votes. Jolly, who received 1,447 votes, withstood a strong showing by Teri Hwei–Ling Greeney, who received 1,315 votes.

Harvey said he is looking forward to having a constructive relationship with the newly elected Jolly. His first order of business will be to get ready for the Town Meeting, which will begin in a few weeks.

> "I'd gladly lay down my body to get more students to vote. Maybe the only way to get them to come out will be to wait until I run [for re–election],"
> – Amherst Select Board member Hill Boss

But it carried all the hallmarks of November 17, which has been silent since the slaying of a Greek shipyard owner 11 months ago. November 17 is the only terrorist group in Greece known to use rockets. It often waits days before claiming responsibility for an attack.

Jolly was very pleased to have won, and looks forward to learning what people have to say about town government, and listening to citizens and student concerns.

As a UMass art student and a school activist, she also is considering serving as a Select Board liaison with the Town Public Arts Commission and the School Board.

As for UMass candidates, students James Eltringham and Jolyon Yates both received 66 votes, 12 apiece from on– campus voters, to gain seats in Town Meeting which meets next month.

UMass student and Select Board write–in candidate Jason Vecchio finished last in the election with 163 votes, but said he felt good about the way things went.

Vecchio said that he was very proud of his supporters, and added that other than not getting his name on the ballot, he wouldn't change a thing about the election.

"I felt I was a solid candidate, my issues were strong, I was articulate," Vecchio said. "A lot of what happened [in the election] was just the reality of a write in campaign."

Vecchio felt the University's display of participation in this election was not ordinary, and that it made an impact on the town.

"I feel they were taken aback by it," Vecchio said.

Vecchio, who plans to take up residence in Amherst after he graduates, said he would take a couple of months to consider his future political plans.

Dorm sign–in motion fails

Questions over student safety prevent passage

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

A motion intended to provide convenience for students when signing in visitors to residence halls failed after questions of compromising security were raised during last night's meeting of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA).

Senator Michael Rossettie (Southwest, Washington) proposed a motion to make it easier for students to sign in guests to their dorm.

The motion would allow residents to give a list of up to four guests to their cluster office and the guests on the list would be able to show identification and enter the dorm without requiring the resident to come downstairs to the security desk.

Rossettie proposed the motion based on similar programs used at other schools.

"I have some friends who go to [Massachusetts Institute of Technology] and all you have to do is walk in [the dorm] and say your name," Rossettie said.

Senator Brenda Fitzpatrick (Commuter At–Large) said this system could allow visitors to wander the dorm when the resident was not home.

"You could submit a guest list and you could be out to dinner and there could be wandering the dorm for two hours," Fitzpatrick said.

Rossettie said the responsibility of the resident for the visitor would prevent this.

"People are still responsible for their guests even if they are not there," Rossettie said.

Senator Seth Avakian (Southwest, John Adams) also was concerned about letting visitors in dorms without ensuring the resident is there.

"The guest list gives an open window to people who don't live there to be there through the night without the host being there," Avakian said. "What housing is pushing for is greater security and this will not help it. It will hurt it."

Senator Jennifer Casasanto (Southwest At–Large) debated in favor of the motion.

"You take it into your own hands. If you use your name to submit a guest list then you're still responsible even if your not there," Casasanto said. "This makes it easier for our constituents. I really don't see the problem with this."

Senator Eleanor Court (Orchard Hill, Field) also had security concerns.

"If your roommate goes away for the weekend and leaves a list and you also have a list, there could be eight people with one host," Court said.

Casasanto said it is now possible to have up to 10 peo-

Civil Action author Harr speaks about life as writer

By Nicole Simmons
Collegian Correspondent

Jonathan Harr, author of the non–fiction book A Civil Action, and winner of the National Book Critics Circle Award for Nonfiction, discussed life as a writer with members of University of Massachusetts Journalism Department Chairperson Norman Sims' literary journalism class Tuesday.

A Civil Action follows the lawsuit of several Woburn families who's children died of leukemia caused, they said, by groundwater contamination. They sued the companies believed responsible for the environmental damage — W.R. Grace Co. and Beatrice Foods Co.

Harr, a Northampton resident, discussed the goal of the book.

"I wanted to see what was going on behind the scenes," Harr said.

To do this, Harr shadowed Ian Schlichtmann, the lawyer representing the families, from the time the trial began in 1986. He was granted almost absolute access during the case.

What he didn't see first–hand, he reconstructed later.

"If you're not there, the issue is, to what extent can the reader believe what you've written?" Harr said. He made sure to question all parties involved in a scene to make sure the reconstruction was as accurate as possible.

Harr explained after eight and a half years after starting the project, he was able to take 196 volumes of deposition testimony, 78 days of trial testimony, 57 volumes of pre– and post–trial hearings, and 100 notebooks worth of notes and produce an award–winning book.

"It was a terrible experience, but it was a good outcome. If it wasn't a good outcome, I wouldn't be here telling you what a terrible experience it was," Harr admitted.

Harr's "good outcome" was better than he expected. Not only has the book been a success, but six months before it was published, Robert Redford bought the rights to it for $1.25 million.

"I never thought it would be a movie," Harr said. He didn't think the story was movie material; it was a complicated lawsuit with two defendants in the case, the families never took the stand, and it wasn't exactly a happy ending. Nevertheless, the movie is set to be released this fall, starring John Travolta as Schlichtmann.

One of Harr's biggest obstacles was how to structure the book.

"I didn't go into it with an agenda. I didn't know what I was going to say," Harr said. "Unless you're writing history, you don't know what's going to happen."

Harr was following the story as it happened so he couldn't shape it. He finally decided how to structure the book in 1991, five years after he began it. He made Schlichtmann the center of the story.

Harr has found many parallels between his life as a writer and Schlichtmann's life as a lawyer.

It took Schlichtmann eight years to try his case and Harr eight

Queer profs speak on life experiences

By Dylan Larke
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Pride Alliance — the gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender undergraduate group — hosted a panel of "out" queer professors Tuesday night in the Campus Center.

Professors who participated in the panel discussion included Lisa Henderson, Communication Department; Warren Blumenfeld, Social Diversity and Education Department; Lee Badgett, Economics Department; Helan Page, Anthropology Department; and Barbara Cruikshank, Political Science Department.

The panelists spoke to approximately 70 undergraduates, graduate students and community members about their positive and negative experiences as out gay, lesbian and trangender community members on campus. The panelists described the reactions they received from other department members and students. After the panel, the professors answered questions from the audience.

Henderson, spoke first to the group about her experiences within her department.

"[Although] awkward... and uncomfortable things happened being an out lesbian, [at UMass] nothing bad has ever happened to me as a result of being out," Henderson said.

Henderson has run into conflicts with students in the past, however.

"Students have sometimes made nasty remarks [to me]," Henderson said.

In comparison to Henderson's previous job as one of the few openly gay professors at the University of Pennsylvania, the climate at UMass is much more supportive and diverse.

"There were some antagonistic faculty members that were fearful of me [at Penn State]," Henderson said.

Blumenfeld often facilitates Social Diversity and Education Weekend Seminars and noted that he was the only male on the panel.

"I don't want to suggest at this time that I'll run for any other positions," Vecchio said. "But I continue to have aspirations."

Jolly said Vecchio ran a commendable campaign, which was also beneficial because it got students involved.

"We'll hear a lot from him in the future," Jolly said.

Harvey said Vecchio planned a good campaign, and that 163 votes was a lot for a write-in campaign.

"Everyone I talked to had a favorable impression of him," Harvey said. "I hope he'll stay involved, and I plan to talk to him about possibilities [of involvement]."

The Keg Vote

The Student Government Association (SGA), the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), Commuter Services and the Commuter Area Government worked together to hold the Southwest Voterfest from 12 to 8 p.m. in front of the Hampden Dining Commons in the Southwest Residential district on Tuesday.

According to poll worker Dave Hammer, 51 Southwest area students (27 from district 10a and 24 from district 4a) voted at Hampden in Tuesday's town election, which is a vast improvement over the four students who cast their ballots for a referendum vote last Fall.

In response to Select Board member Hill Boss' suggestion that student voter turnout would improve if kegs were placed by the polls, Voterfest offered kegs of root beer.

"We appreciate Hill Bosses suggestions, because turnout has been higher for this election than for past ones," Hampden poll clerk, and recent UMass graduate, Ben Linkow said.

"We'd appreciate any further suggestions Mr. Boss has," Linkow said.

Boss said he still felt 51 votes did not warrant polls on campus, and was disappointed that the ploy to use him to get more students to come out was not more successful.

"I'd gladly lay down my body to get more students to vote. Maybe the only way to get them to come out will be to wait until I run [for re-election]," Boss said.

About 30 other students were turned away from the on campus polls. Some had their voter registration cancelled by the town because they had failed to vote in previous elections, others had registered in another district, or had moved and forgotten to notify the town.

"In the defense of the town, they have tons of information in their data banks from every student. They choose to remove inaccurate information," Vecchio said.

Regardless of the problems in registration, or the low turnout, student volunteers in Southwest were pleased with the way things went.

"This is excellent, the number of voters from last years elections doubled," Hammer said.

Vecchio's campaign, along with the Voterfest, attracted over 300 people over the course of the day and made Southwest residents aware of the polling places in Hampden, Hammer said.

"This was about voting, not the elections," Hammer said of the Voterfest. "The improved student turnout can only be a good thing as far as that's concerned, if it doubles again we'll keep on getting stronger."

According to Hammer, during the Voterfest 40 students were also registered to vote in the next town elections.

According to Scott Conlin, one of Vecchio's volunteers, there were two Vecchio supporters campaigning for the write-in candidate at each of the towns polling stations.

Supporters of Vecchio stood in front of Hampden, handing prospective voters Vecchio stickers to be placed on the ballots for his write in campaign.

"I've lived in Southwest for two years. I've never seen anything like this before," Conlin said.

"The policy as far as I know you can have 10 people in your room. So I don't see how this would be more than that," Casasanto said.

Senator Sara Cody (Orchard Hill At-Large) felt this system would create additional work for Resident Assistants (RA's).

"Isn't that just going to create more work for RA's," Cody said.

"I'm an RA and I like this motion," Casasanto said. "This is not making anything mandatory. It's just giving students more options."

Court requested that if passed, the system should be implemented later.

"Security needs to train and there are a lot of them so I would like to add a friendly amendment [to the motion] so it would take effect next year," Court said.

Casasanto felt it should be enacted soon in order to work out problems in the system.

"I think we should enact it this spring. It would be a great trial run and then they could work on it over the summer," Casasanto said.

Ball to raise AIDS awareness

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The First Annual University of Massachusetts Players' Ball of 1998, hosted in part by the Soul T.V. Network, will take place Friday from 8 p.m.–1 a.m. in the Student Union Ballroom in recognition of AIDS awareness.

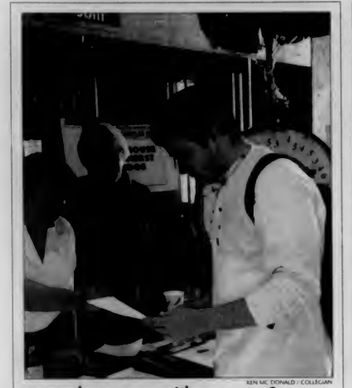
The purpose of the student-organized event is to integrate an enchanted evening with a classic urban ballroom style with a hip-hop theme, in hopes of increasing student awareness in the practices of safe sex and the consequences of AIDS. A portion of the evenings benefits will go towards LifeBeat, "the music industry's fight against AIDS."

UMass students Joslin Green, Evele Hernandez and Mike Harris will be hosting the evening as members for the Soul T.V. Network and have contributed a lot of effort into the event. Soul T.V. Network also has experience in various television productions including segments "Hot Spots" and "Master Music." These segments have been highlighted by various interviews with professional R&B/hip hop artists, and the hosts organized past events including local talents of D.J.'s and entertainers.

Other organizations and individuals that have contributed to making the ball possible include Black Mass Communications Project, Asian Latino African Native American (ALANA) Caucus, Iota Phi Theta, Asian American Student Association, Campus Activities Office, Alpha Phi Alpha, Cape Verdean Students Association, Bertucci's, WMUA–FM, Nam Global Enterprises, Charles Limited, Designer Tyrone Johnson, Designs by Uche, models from UMass, Springfield and Boston, AIC Football, and various other Amherst businesses.

Some of the evening activities that will be taking place include various styles of dance, a wide variety of music, food, and a competition for the Player and Playette of the year. Students will have the chance to judge the winners based on style, appearance, talent, and the individual with the most AIDS awareness.

"We want to bring out AIDS awareness in a unique way by incorporating music, entertainment, and fashion into a social atmosphere," Green said.



"This is an opportunity for everyone to come out and strut their stuff for a good cause," said host Mike Harris of the event.

In benefitting the ball, the event will be televised on UVC Channel 19, as well as the raffling for free tickets tonight on WMUA–FM with D.J. Sweet "T" at 9 p.m.

"So much has gone into organizing the order of events that I want to thank everyone who helped make it possible," Green said.

In the past, Soul T.V. has been responsible for promoting student talent through live and televised productions.

"I think it's great that students have come together for Soul T.V.'s AIDS awareness through the Player's Ball, and it's going to be an off-the-hook event," Hernandez said.

"Why are the majority of the out professors female?" Blumenfeld rhetorically asked the audience.

"Homosexuality, bisexuality and transgenderism transgresses the male gender role to such an extent [that] maybe this is why there are more out female faculty than out male faculty," Blumenfeld said.

Following Blumenfeld was Badgett who explained how hard it was for her to come out to her classes on the first day "because microeconomics is more difficult to come out in than a class on diversity."

"I am out in print... I feel like a professional lesbian... and I am about as out as I can be," Badgett said.

Badgett has received both positive and negative reactions from faculty members and students.

"A lack of understanding made it a little harder being out, [but] being out at least gave me the chance to confront people in homophobic situations," Badgett said.

Badgett has recently been denied tenure and believes this might be because she is so open about her sexual orientation.

"Despite the discrimination, I don't regret coming out," Badgett said. "It is useful to come out."

"I do think it is our responsibility be out. [Coming out] is going to have more personal benefits to you than you can ever imagine," Badgett said.

Page spoke as the next panelist, and is a female-to-male transsexual who spoke about his gender identity and racism he has received being black.

Page lives as a male and underwent a sex realignment procedure 18 months ago. He believes his department has overall been accepting of both his gender identity and transition, but feels his students had considerably more difficulty coming to terms with his surgery.

"You assume that bodies determine who you are... I have always experienced the body as not me," Page said.

Page made clear that throughout his life and at UMass, racism has effected him much more than homophobia.

"Those who identify as white and have a privilege of not being one of color... If anything happened to my job it had nothing to do with my gender, but everything to do with my race," Page said.

Cruikshank was the last to speak.

"Professionally, I have never been set back from being out, but socially I have been," Cruikshank said.

Cruikshank feels that it is hard socially to be queer in departments that are predominately straight.

"I can't related to others socially. The thing I worry about most as an out faculty member is being accused of sexual harassment," Cruikshank said.

The panel was well attended and evoked responses from many of the audience members.

Yearbook shots

You know, you can't escape Monica Lewinsky. In the wake of the dismissal of the Paula Jones case, the media has gone back to focusing their cameras on everybody's favorite California tart. And we've gone back to seeing that picture.

Mike Messaros

We all remember it. You have to. There was our little Monica, dressed up for the internship she didn't deserve, all smiles. But the picture turned out horribly wrong. Lewinsky's picture made her look chalky, googly-eyed and confused (still smiley, though — she's a trooper if nothing else). She seems to have a stewardess uniform on. It's one of those pictures that she probably sent home to mom who was like "That's... very pretty, Monica." Then it was hidden deep in some drawer under that ugly prom photo were she has frosted hair and some dress out of Tiffany's closet.

But then the fit hit the shan and that picture became the picture of the moment. And I feel sorry for her. Because we all have that picture, back from the day. Think back — there's some picture from senior week or spring break that you don't want the world to see. Monica just had the misfortune of becoming famous. All of a sudden, people were judging her by that picture. On top of it, the President's cnoice in ladies was being questioned. But if you look at other photos, videotape, she's lookin' foxy. Her handlers have gone to great lengths to show her off as being pretty and fashionable. Hey, I give her an eight out of 10. But that picture, it will always be there.

My senior year of high school, I had to get the senior portrait taken. Now, most people look forward to this, getting the hair cut, paying extra money to have the zits taken out of the picture afterward. Not me. I hate having my picture taken. I just wanted to get it over with. So that morning I had the misfortune of having a LaSalle High School delicacy, breakfast pizza. Breakfast pizza is made from "egg," "cheese," and some kind of crust. I washed that baby down with some Mountain Dew. Oh, yeah, you don't have to be Richard Simmons to know that's not good. It's like Pop Rocks and Pepsi.

As it turned out, in the picture I look gassy (which by all accounts, could be the case), and confused. I seem to be falling asleep. To top it all off, my head looks too big for my body. I'm telling you — my head is not too big for my body. But by some trick of photography, I've got a Charlie Brown's head. It gives the wrong impression of me. I don't look like that. You have to realize, with the right haircut, I cut a dashing stance. My mom says I am quite handsome. I have spent the years since trying to keep that picture out of sight.

I worry at night, when I have nothing better to do, that one day I'll be caught in some peccadillo, and that picture will be what everyone sees of me. The media will stake out my house and scare my dog: "We think we see Mike, a.k.a. 'Pumpkinhead,' but it could just be a weather balloon or a Kodiak bear." People like that mummy Joan Rivers will judge my outfits on the E! channel. "Yuck! How many times is he going to wear that Flyers jersey this week? Do the wash Mike! And comb your hair! You can't wear a baseball hat with a suit!"

Something along these lines happened to my friend Mike in high school. We had to hand in baby and toddler pictures so that they could be matched up with our senior portraits. Kind of a "look-how-far-they've-come" kind of thing. Not wanting to leave this dangerous chore up to potentially starry-eyed parents, I got a nice little picture where I have nothing going in or coming out of my mouth and I am fully clothed. Other kids did the same, choosing tasteful photos from those years, but my friend Mike wasn't thinking. He let his mom choose the picture. So there it was one day, a picture of Mike taking a bath in a sink. The water was dirty, but not dirty enough that it could obscure a certain young feature. And this was an all-boys school. So far the rest of the year, Mike had to listen to people questioning his hygiene and his manhood. No one needs that.

So here's what I'm saying: watch your back. You may laugh at Monica now, but one day, you'll be watching TV, and there's that picture of you, on the toilet, reading Swedish porn (there are no rules over there) that your buddy took as a joke. Oh man, it will not be pretty. And then Monica will have the last laugh.

Karaoke king

Remember when I told you how I wanted to be a rock star? Well, my dreams have come true.

In Chicopee, at least.

Like I told you last week, my birthday was last week, so we went out to the Hu-Ke-Lau in Chicopee to celebrate. I had never been, but my friend Teddy (a Western Massachusetts baseball legend, I'll have you know) sold me on it by promising "an incredible buffet," and the potential for a karaoke party.

And hey, I love buffets.

We should have known it was going to be an interesting night when, after some scrumptious swordfish, our waitress told us that the night's entertainment would be Floyd Patterson.

"You mean Floyd Patterson, former heavyweight champion of the world, is at the Hu-Ke-Lau, right now?" I said.

Now, if P.J. ever knew I ate swordfish and hung out with former heavyweight champion of the world Floyd Patterson in the same night, he'd be pretty proud.

"No, but his son, Floyd Patterson is. He's a singer," she said.

Uh, OK.

None of us, besides maybe Housemate A, (and he's never been normal) wanted to see Floyd Patterson's punk kid sing R&B covers. Our waitress sensed we weren't impressed.

"There's also karaoke at the bar," our waitress said.

Hmm. Sounds like a party.

Problem is, the place is dead. People are sleeping on their tables. (Maybe they never had the swordfish).

Something had to be done.

So I recruit Housemate A to sign "Copacabana" with me, because I was scared as hell about signing to the citizens of Chicopee. (Never an easy crowd).

Now, I don't know if it was the bright lights, the swordfish or the scorpion bowls (both of them), but dammit if I didn't feel like a diva as soon as I hit the stage.

Within five bars of "Copacabana" (his name was Rico, and you're damn straight he wore a diamond), I was belting out Neil Diamond's finest, complete with hip-swinging and a dance I like to do around the house when I beat Housemate C in Sega.

Luke Meredith

Despite messing up "Lola" and "Rico" more than once, we were a hit.

And damn it if we didn't keep signing.

I had two different older ladies ask me to sing with them. I had a girl snuggle up to me and ask me to sing "Paradise by the Dashboard Light" with her. I said no (frankly, she was chubby, wasted and a wee bit flirtatious), and she said "No, not with me. I want you to sing it with your little college friends."

Oh, we love you Hu-Ke-Lau.

It was diva time. I sang "Lady In Red" by walking through the crowd and signing it to a girl in a red sweater (Big Red knows nothing, let's keep it that way) while C and Gary crooned in the back "Kathleen (or Big Red) is red in the... head."

Quite a moment.

By the end, some guy named Wayne (who plays softball for the Nitros) was calling me the "Karaoke King." I sang "Summer Lovin'" twice. I sang Elvis. I sang the "Dirty Dancing" song. I was thanking people for coming out to the Hu-Ke-Lau. And the lady running the karaoke machine kept saying "Oh Goodness" whenever we performed.

I think it was a compliment.

But by the end of the night, things got blurry. Some local Chicopee chicks tried to steal the lei the good people of the Hu-Ke-Lau gave me for turning 23, and a guy known to the world only as "Spence" came clean with the crowd after he messed up the words to his final song. He told the crowd "I don't know this version."

But there's only one version of "Amazing Grace."

By the time we all got up for an encore of "Summer Lovin'," it was mayhem. The magic of karaoke had faded into Chicopee craziness, and me and "my little college friends" jetted back to Amherst before last call.

But if you ever go to the Hu-Ke-Lau, I recommend the swordfish, and maybe a scorpion bowl or two.

You'll sing like a diva. Trust me.

Exhibit responsibility

Last Friday, I was walking past the Campus Pond around ten or eleven o'clock at night. It was a quiet, pleasant night. There were only a few people walking around. The ducks were sleeping peacefully under some trees. The moon and stars shone down on campus with a calm and beautiful light. A bunch of drunks were trying to climb the Fine Arts Center (FAC).

Huh?

Mark Shea

As I watched, three guys attempted to scale the walls of the FAC. Now, I don't know how familiar you are with the FAC's convoluted architecture, so I'll try to illustrate this. Next to those wide stairs leading down to the pond there's this roof that slopes low enough to the ground to climb on top of. Near the stairway, this roof narrows to no more than a foot or two. The kids were trying to edge their way out along this ledge.

Finally, they got scared sober enough to climb back down to where their friends had been stumbling around waiting for them. The whole bunch took off, laughing hysterically. Whatever illicit substance they were using, I'm pretty sure they were using too much of it.

Now, I know you're probably thinking, "So what? Most of the University crawls into a chemically-induced fog on Thursday night and doesn't come out again until Sunday. Why does this particular bunch get valuable newspaper space devoted to their antics? Why do you care how people spend their weekends?"

Well, I realize that a lot of people drink themselves into a stupor on the weekend, and normally, I couldn't care less. If you want to reach a higher plane of consciousness through chemicals, or just blow off steam, or turn yourself into a puddle on the floor, then that's your business and more power to you. As long as you don't bother me, I can't think of a reason to worry about what you do with your time.

These kids are a little different. It wouldn't have been too difficult for one of them to slip off that roof. They would have fallen for about 15 feet before landing on the concrete steps and bouncing down to the ground. Then the emergency vehicles show up, and it's another death at UMass.

And that's what I don't need to see any more of here. We've already had plenty of people mess themselves up beyond repair as a result of excessive chemical indulgence.

I know lots of people who get intoxicated and don't try to stage a human fly act. They go to parties, stay in the dorms, or walk around outside. Very few of them perch on narrow ledges high above the ground to have a good time. These more responsible substance abusers are made to suffer unfairly for the actions of fools like the ones I saw clinging to the walls of the FAC.

When people get hurt or killed because they're inebriated and doing stupid things, it is sad, and I feel sorry for the friends and family of the injured or deceased. But I find it hard to have sympathy for someone who severely wounds himself because he had a few too many and decided he was invincible. I'm even less sympathetic due to the fact that those of us who survive their going down in a blaze of glory have to deal with all the aggravations they cause. We get investigations, regulations, and calls from parents asking, "What the hell is going on at that school of yours?" Personally, my parents are suspicious enough of my college activities without a weekly fatality report on the news.

"I'm tired of dealing with hassles caused by people who can't control themselves when they drink."

I'm tired of dealing with hassles caused by people who can't control themselves when they drink. Of course, everyone ties one on now and again, but most of us don't need a babysitter to make sure that we don't hurt ourselves. We shouldn't be made to suffer for the idiocy of people like the ones climbing the FAC.

So I have a request for those guys, and anyone else planning on falling off buildings diving into shallow water, or wrapping a car around a telephone pole in the coming weekends. I don't think it's an unreasonable one. If you're going to do something stupid that might get you killed, go somewhere else. What you do is your own concern; I'm not one to tell people how they should or shouldn't act. Just do it somewhere else, somewhere that the rest of us won't be guilty by association.

Mark Shea is a UMass student.

Letters to the Editor

SGA coverage inaccurate

To the editor:

Monday's Collegian (4/6) contained an article regarding the Student Government Association (SGA) budget and the SGA finance reserves. The sections about the budget discussed last year's SGA budget, which ends this semester, not the new budget currently being written.

Contrary to the article, the purpose of the Finance committee, as stated in our Constitution, is not just emergency relief of RSOs. It exists as an auxiliary funding source so that the Senate, through the committee, can help sponsor worthwhile programs and events, support new RSOs, provide help to underfunded RSOs and help the small RSOs succeed. Funding is allocated on a first come, first serve basis, and an enormous number of petitions came in this year, which drained our $26,000 budget.

I am proud that this committee has remained fair all year, without the bickering of the Senate, and has funded RSOs that needed and deserved money. We supported 30 different programs, from speakers like Edward James Olmos and Starr Parker, to our nationally ranked Crew and Dance teams. We funded two area spring events, gave money to several underfunded or new RSOs and supported an array of other programs. Our allocations were based on the petitions that came before us and how they met the criteria laid out in the Constitution.

I stand behind our allocations 100 percent. It is petty of the Collegian, and Senator Avakian, to assume that spending our funding early was "irresponsible." If we care about the finance reserves being drained, then tackle the problem at it's source. Give small and medium-sized RSOs, the backbone of our campus, the money they need in the SGA budget, and then the finance reserves will last. Allocating huge chunks of money to a few RSOs and letting the rest trickle down hurts smaller groups that work just as hard. I am tired of seeing a $90,000 allocation given out and still not having a spring concert while most groups on campus scrape by. Perhaps Senator Avakian, Chair of the Ways & Means Committee, will be responsible enough to look out for the little guy in this year's budget.

Middle East problems

To the editor:

Recently, Mr. James Rubin, spokesman for the U.S. State Department, when faced with U.S. Envoy Dennis Ross' failed mission to "gently nudge" the right-wing government of Benjamin Netanyahu to accept a 13 percent withdraw of Israeli troops from the West Bank, stated that the United States really had two options left.

One would be to "disengage" as a broker of peace altogether. He stated that if both sides were not interested in peace, the United States would not continue its efforts. The second would be to continue to help both sides achieve an agreement.

It is an outrage that Mr. Rubin could even suggest the United States "disengage" from exerting its influence to help broker a settlement to the standoff.

Why? Because either Mr. Rubin thinks American taxpayers are stupid or he is being entirely disingenuous. How can we be "disengaged" from a country where we are its loyal patron to the tune of $3.5 billion a year in taxpayer's money in foreign aid guarantor of Israel's security?

We are hardly "disengaged." Israel gives the United States a strategic foothold in the Middle East. But it seems the United States is beside itself to get Israel, the beneficiary of our tremendous generosity, to honor the same agreements on withdraw of Israeli troops from occupied lands that the Israelis themselves signed with the Palestinians at Oslo.

It is clear that Netanyahu needs a little more forceful persuasion to move him. This relationship of "whispering in the dark" has accomplished nothing.

One might ask: "Just who is putting money in the meter?"

Just the other week, Congress gave President Clinton a signed letter by members, urging him not to make public a peace proposal that would "embarrass" the Israelis.

Embarrass? We are talking about peace and the interests of the Israeli and Palestinian people versus the status quo ante of perennial wars, bombings and killing!

Netanyahu declared that if the Clinton Administration makes the proposal public, then "no deal."

What? "No deal?" Netanyahu, didn't your mother tell you, "don't bite the hand that feeds you"?

Spring trends for women

Seema Gangatirkar

With the advent of warmer weather, it's time to, literally, spring into fashion. And style has never been easier than this season's hottest looks. Trends to look for this season include tailored white shirts, longer hemlines, shinier materials and knits.

With simpler cuts and classic lines, this year's coolest styles are heading for a cleaner look. But tailored shirts and khakis don't have to mean turning your wardrobe dull, as vibrant new colors are hitting the racks.

Spring usually means pastel colors but this season, colors are more playful than the usual soft shades of blue, purple, yellow and pink. The '70s are all the rage in spring fashion these days, so keep an eye out for brighter, more neon shades of pastels in eye-catching colors like with eyebrow-raising names like raspberry, pineapple, kiwi and mango.

This spring, brighter colors are supported best with a neutral palette. For example, pair a bright top with a pair of neutral pants in beige, gray, black, navy or khaki. Especially popular this season are pants cinched with belts or classic trousers with a matching-color belt measuring at least an inch wide.

Good news from the skirt front, as hemlines are no longer receding. Hemlines are longer this spring, with some of the shorter skirts measuring just an inch or two about the knee. Longer skirts are hitting the mid-calf or even lower. If you're really brave, you may want to try some of the slimmer fit skirts that hit exactly at the knee.

Look out for knitwear — especially cardigans — this spring, as this versatile fabric can be both casual and dressy, not to mention comfortable. Cardigans are a must have, as it's easy to dress up or dress down with a one-button cardigan. The latest cardigans have short sleeves and one- button, easy to wear over a t-shirt or tank top.

Try pairing a cardigan with a tank-top over slacks to dress up or over a spaghetti-strap spring dress for a more formal outfit. Another look to try is pairing a cardigan with a baby t-shirt, and leave the cardigan open for a more sophisticated image.

Capri pants, made famous by Mary Taylor Moore on the "Dick Van Dyke Show," are back in style. Capri pants, which start about mid-shin, usually come in basic colors such as black, navy and white. Pair the pants with a bright pastel sweater set and a pair of mules or slides for a cool retro look.

Swimsuits, always a high-rising topic for women in the spring, are available in more luxurious styles — if you're not planning to swim. Look for velvet, fur-lined, sequined and cashmere suits. Also check out the new two-piece styles, with the boy short bottoms, available in a variety of eye- catching colors.

And finally, for all of you who were sick of the matte- finish pastel nail polish colors of last spring, metallic, iridescent and pearlescent polishes are back and hotter than ever. The colors are still pastel, but are dressed up with a shimmery shine for more excitement.

You can't possibly ignore your feet and if comfort isn't an issue for you, the new sandals are more open and strappy, with heels starting at the three inch mark. Other shoes to keep in mind are Japanese-influenced thong sandals, sandals with wooden bottoms, as well as shoes done in suede or snake-skin patterns.

But whatever the look you choose for this spring, keep two things in mind: never eat spaghetti when wearing a white shirt and keep it simple!

The GQ look at UMass?

Jonathon Liberty

At a University as eclectic as our own, men's fashion ranges from non-existent to maximalist, from Dockers to Dolce & Gabbana, resulting in a modern spectrum that allows true self-expression. However, self-expression easily leads to categories (image) which need not be mentioned for their overwhelming stature on campus.

But forget these categories for one minute; I appeal to only one: the well-dressed man.

The grey suit: a spring staple

In a time of the casual Friday and even the casual office, men forgot about suits. But for spring, a single-breasted grey suit is essential — from weddings to job interviews to the club that won't let you in with jeans and a tee-shirt. It's plenty versatile and being made by everyone, including Calvin Klein, Hugo Boss, Helmut Lang, Donna Karan, Todd Oldham, Kenneth Cole etc, etc. While the three-button has become classic, the two-button is a bit conservative and the four-button is very hip, but they are all trim and hang close to the body (here's a hint: always leave that last button undone, it allows more flexibility and simply says that you know what you're doing). Several designers offer ticket pockets, but stay away, these will pass quickly as they did in the late '60s. Materials range, of course there's linen, but a lightweight wool is always a good choice and a double-faced wool lends to fine iridescence, which is not only safe, but fashionable too.

Why grey? It's the new black and the new khaki, and best of all it allows a plethora of options to wear underneath the suit — to make it your own. For a casual look, a lightweight, fitted, white oxford with a spread collar (top button undone) is fine and even a knit crewneck will do — but please, no tee-shirts. If you want to dress it up, try an iridescent shirt from Thomas Pink, almost any color will work, then carefully choose a tie with a sheen that matches your shirt. Ties are looking better than ever, but the vibrant, solid silks seen last year have been replaced with small, geometric patterns which are just as attractive. One more thing, you can wear a collar on the outside of your lapel without looking like some pimped-out freak from '70s — in fact many shirts are made just for this reason, just make sure the collar of your shirt does not exceed your suits lapel and you'll be safe — you may even look like someone from the '90s.

The spring shoe: square

That big, rounded toe seen on most shoes from any designer in the past few years is all done. The square toe has taken over and is being well-made by Kenneth Cole, Natha, M.C. &Power, Inc of London and even Bruno Magli.

This style adds a sleekness to loafers and lace-ups which was never there before, and with the addition of a bulkier leather sole and the new heel (one to two inches), you can't go wrong. Black is always safe (and must be worn with that grey suit), but a spectrum of brown is flooding the market, offering almost too many choices.

Accessories: metal gear

Flat-finish, base metal has been twisted and formed into every accessory — from cuff links to watches to sunglasses. Storm watches offer a wide variety of interesting styles and Kenneth Cole's Precious Metal sunglasses will protect your eyes and keep you looking good throughout the summer and well into the fall.

Fall: a peek

Minimalist style is taking over in the Fall; simplicity is a must. Ties are getting skinnier and clothes are getting sleeker. Led by Helmut Lang and D&G, men's fashion is actually becoming something that matters.

Modern makeup goes retro

By Amy Brosey
Daily Collegian

STATE COLLEGE, Penn. (U-WIRE) — Call it the end of the simple, natural look. Call it a chance to experiment. Call it the return of the long hours it took to apply makeup in the '80s.

Whatever you call it, bold makeup is back in a major way.

A barrage of new products meant to attract customers with more color options might also mean more time spent in front of the mirror this spring, and more people looking to '80s musicians such as A Flock of Seagulls and Twisted Sister for inspiration.

A glance at newer cosmetic lines proves that subtlety is not the word to be used at the makeup counter this season.

For example, Revlon's spring LavenDare line focuses on both deep and bright purple hues in nail polish, lipsticks and eyeshadows that many haven't experimented with since Martha Quinn was on MTV.

Nicole DiPaola (senior, telecommunications) said she has noticed the new makeup shades in magazines.

"I guess it could catch on, if everyone wants to do what they see in the magazines," she said.

DiPaola said although she wouldn't wear the seemingly '80s-inspired colors, one of her friends often wears a light lavender lipstick and eyeshadow.

L'Oreal's World Wide Web site introduces its latest unusual shade with "Dare to bring your eyes into focus with yellow — a surprise touch for lids."

The models are shown wearing the yellow eyeshadow right up to their eyebrows. Culture Club-style, but with a slightly more blended '90s twist.

Tracey Utz, business manager of Manelline Salon Systems, said the salon carries the Sebastian makeup line, which features products such as a light purple lipstick, yellowish blush and yellow and purple eyeshadow.

These colors are more popular with younger clientele, but probably won't catch on with professional business people, she said.

Other makeup lines focus on combining shades to create entirely different colors.

Revlon's recent Street Wear line dares customers to "experiment with color," according to Revlon's Web site.

Street Wear — in colors such as "toad," "splash" and "prissy" — can be layered to create new colors and open up a wide palette for customers who are willing to experiment and layer on different shades of cosmetics such as nail polish.

Whether customers take to the new cosmetic colors and techniques or the influence of the '80s seems to be bombarding the makeup counters this season.

One can only hope banana clips won't come back in style, too.

NY opera provides comic relief

DAUGHTER OF THE REGIMENT
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
April 7

As the orchestra began the rich and melodic overture, the curtains opened revealing a small village nestled in the mountains of the Alps. There were miniature houses, chateaux, and a church decorating the stage. The stage was devoid of characters, and in the first few minutes, forcing the audience to concentrate purely on the scenery and the atmosphere was set for the New York City Opera National Company's production of Donizetti's Daughter of the Regiment.

In this melodious comic opera, we are told the story of an orphaned Marie, who is adopted by and becomes the spirited darling of Napoleon's 21st Regiment. This is Marie's tale of love, war, and the search for her true identity.

Marie (the daughter of the regiment) however, was a strong character, who was worthy of her role. Her voice was light, rich, and clear resonating throughout the concert hall. It was an absolute pleasure to behold her maneuvering her voice up and down scale upon scale.

The character Marquise de Berkenfeld, played by Sondra Gelb was not as strong of a character. Gelb portrayed a high- class women, and her acting was just not up to par. Her vocalizations did not befit the expectations of high-powered Marquise.

Sulpice (the sergeant of the regiment) was a great, big, burly man, but it was soon revealed that underneath he was a big lovable teddy bear. Tonio, played by Matthew Chellis, was portrayed as a hopeless romantic, whose passion for Marie truly shined throughout the production. While for the most part Chellis rose to the occasion, making Tonio one of the most memorable characters, in a few of his songs he missed some of the most key high notes. But what he lacked in vocal talent, he made up in his acting.

The regiment, made up of 10 men, was a cute little crew. They were comically portrayed as buffoon-like, although kindhearted, soldiers with an over-inflated view of the their looks and charm. Feeding into this idea, in the Regiment's song, Marie told us that husbands and lovers alike, were afraid to see them coming, thus implying that the women were more than happy to see them.

At the end of the second act, Marie was removed her regiment family to become a Duchess, under the supervision of her Aunt, the Marquise.

Starting off act two the curtain opened to the same mountainous back drop, but centrally located in the chateau of the Marquise. Disheartened after being separated from both her father (the regiment) and her lover (Tonio), Marie's attempts to fit into her new life seemed to be in vain. But just at the moment that Marie's fate seems to be doomed to an arranged marriage, the regiment and Tonio come to the rescue.

The Duchesse de Crackentorp, played by Nancy Shade, was memorable. She captured her character perfectly. All dressed in black the Duchesse portrayed a high-class citizen, with a shrill voice.

The opera ended on a high note, as reunited with her real family and her true love, Marie's tale comes to a happy ending.

Gordon offers insight into be–bop

This month, blues guitar legend Johnny Winter is back after a five–year recording hiatus with Johnny Winter Live In NYC'97.

Winter began playing in his native Texas during the 60's and was dubbed by Rolling Stone in 1968 as "the hottest item outside of Janis Joplin." He has played with blues greats B.B. King, Bobby Bland and Muddy Waters, and he has been nominated for four Grammy awards while also having played on three Grammy award–winning albums with Waters.

This CD lives up to all of Winter's credentials, never disappointing and remaining steadily rooted in the electric blues, but also offering a variety of sounds, ranging from rock to funk.

He opens his five set with an instrumental, Hideaway, showcasing his full range on the guitar, and sounding like fellow bluesman and Texan, Stevie Ray Vaughn, but a bit faster and not quite as biting. Winter gets low–down and dirty as he plays and sings his tail off on Sen–Sa–Shun/Got My Mojo Working, and his slow jam on Ray Charles' Black Jack seems to have his guitar resonating with determination on every lick.

Just A Little Bit is the first song that features a riff– oriented approach, offering a good change of pace from Winter's extended jams. On Jimmy Reed's The Sun Is Shining, you can actually feel Reed's spirit through Winter's mastery of the slide technique and his laid–back singing style.

The heavy hitter of this CD is Winter's version of Elmore James' The Sky Is Crying, probably the greatest electric blues song of all time. With the

Gang Starr's latest about respect

By Adam Dlugacz
Collegian Staff

MOMENT OF TRUTH
Gang Starr
Noo Trybe

Gang Starr has got to be the sure shot. Say it loud cause the crew is back for springtime. One of the hardest things to do in hip hop, or in the record industry in general, is to maintain a certain level of success over an elongated period of time. Think about it: Other then KRS–One, Tribe Called Quest, De La Soul — and the latter two aren't even that old.

Try to figure out how many have stayed afloat over the years. Remember all those groups who dropped ill tracks in the '90s who have never been heard from again. Snoop Dogg and Dr. Dre were the bomb four years ago, don't deny it, and now they are barely mentioned except for Snoop's recent guest appearances. Then you have Gang Starr, who have simply been an institution since they started. Say the name Guru and Premier and watch heads bow out of respect.

Premier has always been one of the best kept secrets in the production game, until this year when every track that blew up seem to be produced by Primo. Then there's Guru who did his Jazzmatazz series, disgracefully slept on by most of you, who lit it up over jazz tracks. Then there were the rumors that Gang Starr was over, that the two would never be seen together again. Well to quote Al Pacino, "Fuhgeddaboutit," cause they're "putting in work."

Opening up Moment Of Truth with "You Know My Steez," Guru lays it on the line and tells you exactly what to expect on this album. If you don't know, how about the tightest production in the game, butter bean beats and a flow that Guru should patent.

However, this is a deeper album, while Guru can still spit with the best, he's attempting to reach his audience on a more mental and spiritual level. "Robbin Hood Theory" espouses the virtues of taking the government down to a street level, and making them give the people what they really deserve. The thing is, Guru is not mindlessly preaching pump 'em up revolutionary theories, he's actually put a lot of thought into what he is talking about.

"Work" and "Royalty" (featuring K–Ci and JoJo) and should have everyone wide open, both talk about succeeding in hip hop. For Gang Starr it is about respect, but not through money, drugs, and trashy girls. Instead it is about elevating your head through reading so that you can be prepared to deal with problems you might have to confront. Can you even remember the last MC who rhymed about reading books. The other plus is that Premier actually talks on the end of "Royalty," and there are rumors that it is the most anyone has ever heard him say.

"JFK 2 LAX" deals with the rumors floating around Guru's arrest. While the title track "Moment of Truth" talks about being a man, and actually facing up to the hardships and controversies of life rather then pretending you are living out a b–movie better reserved for Sunday morning television. "She Knowz What She Wantz" is a pro–female track, and a nice change of pace from girls who brag about using "sex as a weapon."

The album is littered with guest appearances from Inspectah Deck (who will probably be the next member of Wu–Tang to take over), Scarface, Krumb Snatch (whose simply killing phony MC's), G–Dep and Shiggy Sha. M.O.P appear on "B.I. vs Friendship," a track about the difficulties that arise from putting your friends on and getting no love in return. The roughneck flow displayed by M.O.P. is a nice back drop for Guru, and fully represents the anger of the track. "The Militia" features Big Shug and Freddie Foxx should be on mix tapes everywhere, and is a clinic on how to cut a posse track.

Overall Guru and Premier have done a lot of growing up and it is displayed on this album. They have learned the power they wield by being orators of such stature and rather then trying to collect the cheddar they are trying to uplift a community. When you buy this album, listen to it and absorb it, and then maybe you'll understand where true respect comes from. "Gang Starr has got to be the sure shot," no doubt. A

Howard Stern to challenge "SNL"

Howard Stern and CBS? Plans are in the works for the "shock jock" of radio to host a late night show opposite "Saturday Night Live."

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

Last Wednesday night, Comedy Central's "South Park" aired its "Who is Eric Cartman's father?" episode. Like many of you, I waited four weeks to see the answer to the question that was baffling TV viewers for so long, and to be perfectly honest, I still have no idea what actually happened. Maybe it had something to do with the fact that the show was aired on April Fool's day, or maybe the answer lies deep inside the personalities and sick humor of "South Park" creators Trey Parker and Matt Stone.

But you have to give Parker and Stone credit for the massive build-up for the April 1 episode and with all the hype, it's understandable why some viewers might be upset the April Fool's episode for two reasons: first, it wasn't even an episode of "South Park" and second, fans will have to wait another four weeks to discover Cartman's paternity.

The truth is, if you watched this episode as a normal "South Park," it wasn't that bad. "South Park" aired a 30- minute long Terence and Philip (ironically, the one-time banned cartoon by the parents of the "South Park" children). In defense of "South Park," I have to say, Terence and Philip are funny! Maybe they aren't funny for the length of time that we were exposed to them, but there is a certain humor to them.

Terence and Phillip have the same crude humor as all of the "South Park" characters, and up until now, we did not much about these two characters. From eating "Kraff" (used to be Kraft which is short for Macaroni and Cheese, but the cheese company threatened to sue "South Park" for slander! dinner, to their constant flatulence problem, Terence and Philip were sure to make you laugh at least a few times last week, and those few laughs are worth the few more weeks we have to wait to find what's up with Cartman's father.

It seems that I have been hitting on this topic every week, but since many of you keep asking me about it, I will keep everyone updated on what is happening Wednesday nights at 9 p.m. Previously, Fox announced that they would remove "Significant Others" from its line-up three weeks before the end of its run. "Significant Others" joins CBS casualty "Four Corners" in the television graveyard.

But every cloud has its silver lining and while "Significant Others" cast might be heading towards the unemployment lines, this season's break-out hit "Ally McBeal" will air re-runs until April 22, when the Emmy award winning "Party of Five" returns with all new episodes. If you have not seen "Ally McBeal," this is the perfect time to get a chance to check it out; it's excellent.

Howard Stern is starting to reveal some primitive plans for his late night television show that will begin in late August. As a long time Stern listener, I am very excited about this, and am counting the days until it airs. Stern, who has been given full control over the production of a CBS show that will apparently face off against NBC's "Saturday Night Live," says: "The show is going to have the same thing that my radio show has: explicit sex and nudity. I have no idea how they're going to allow it on television." He also added that he would like to have Norm MacDonald, who was fired from "SNL" for being too offensive on his news reports, to do the weekly news.

When MacDonald heard this, he said in a public interview that he would be more than honored to take this position. There's only one thing we can be sure of about "The Howard Stern Show" — Norm MacDonald will definitely not be the most offensive cast member!

For those of you who love parades, Sunday gives us Disney's Happy Easter Parade. "Live from the Magic Kingdom in Orlando," this two-hour long program allows viewers to not only watch the parade, but also gives you a chance to see behind the scenes on new and old attractions. This is also Disney's hidden way to advertise for everything you could possibly think of.

If you happen to tune in on Sunday at 12:30 p.m., you'll be sure to see commercials for Disney movies, merchandise and of course that age old Kissimmee/St. Cloud ad that offers discount fairs to Orlando. All together, the show ought to be worth a watch.

Finally, on Nickelodeon had its annual "Kids Choice Awards." Hosted by talk show host Rosie O'Donnell, this long excuse to keep kids awake after bed time finished with Hanson, Alicia Silverstone, and Jim Carey among the few that were able to pick up awards. The voting was done by kids over the Internet at Nickelodeon.com.

Mercury Rising suffers from lack of logic, dialogue

Alec Baldwin stars in the unredeemable Mercury Rising.

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

MERCURY RISING
Directed by Harold Becker with Bruce Willis, Alec Baldwin and Miko Hughes Playing at Mountain Farms Four Theaters

Bruce Willis battles the sinister U.S. government in Mercury Rising, an action/thriller about an autistic child cracking a government supercode that has the same amount of bone-shaking thrills as A Kenny G Christmas. This movie is so bad it doesn't even deserve any clever puns on the title. It shouldn't be called Mercury Falling or even Mercury Sucking. The best title is Stupid Stupid Stupid... Stupid. The movie is so mindlessly mediocre, the best way to talk about it is to list the bad things.

• The casting. Bruce Willis is a cynical outcast with a heart of gold (Art Jefferies) and Alec Baldwin is a grinning, arrogant power-chaser (Lt. Colonel Kudrow). Where have we seen that before? Oh yeah, every movie they've ever done. They both drive their stereotypes into the ground here.

• The music. The movie's tone is fairly dark, full of guns and shadowy conspiracies, but the score is more sugary than Vermont maples in March. The effect is like "The X-Files" scored by Disney.

• The widespread dumbness. Not only is the movie made badly, but the characters we are supposed to identify with don't have the capacity for rational thought. Even though he is up against a government agency capable of finding and attacking a little boy in the middle of a major city, and for some reason doesn't think that a phone call to his only friend in the FBI might possibly be tapped. Furthermore, when Art knocks on a stranger's door in the middle of the night and violently demands entry without explanation, the stranger doesn't call for help, even though she already saw him hide from the police. Instead she decides to become his love interest.

• The place of women and family. Not only does the stranger, Stacey, let the deeply suspicious Art into her home, she accepts the care of Art's "child" at the expense of her career. Up until that point, the relationship between Art and the child was interesting, a lifelong individualist saddled all at once with an unruly responsibility, with family. But Stacey lets Art off the hook. The woman takes the kid so the macho father figure can go off unencumbered and save the world. It's not just convenient and subtly sexist, it's dull. Furthermore, the movie — for all its glorification of the bond between Art and the child — treats family as more of a annoyance than a positive value. Art's friend at the FBI can't help Art because he has a wife and kids. Only unattached males can save the world? What is that?

• The dialogue. Apparently the language sculptors from "Walker, Texas Ranger" got some free time and decided to write a movie.

• The ending. When a movie's script is as carefully crafted as a landfill and the ending is still confusing, something is desperately wrong.

• The "scary" government. The movie seems wants to create a sense of paranoia towards the government, but the all-seeing, all-murdering conspiracy seems to consist of Mr. Baldwin and some guy who looks like he should be performing root canals. The end battle is not as important as one man versus the government, its just Bruce versus Alec and the evil dentist.

• Logic. If the government would kill an 8-year old boy who can't even communicate with his parents, why don't they kill everyone who helped make the code? The code makers would fall far more easily into a enemy hands, unless the government thinks the bad guys have spies in nursery schools. And if one autistic child can crack the code, doesn't that raise the possibility that others could? Why not just kill all autistic children? Why not just kill everyone?

• What it could have been. The story itself presents some fascinating possibilities, ideas of fractured families and modern communication, but the movie makers don't have the talent or desire to create anything but a "MacGyver" episode without bombs made of soap and chocolate. In short, it's no fun. D slide in full effect again. Winter's version is funkier and more wavering than James' original, but it still captures the pure soul of the song — it may be better than Stevie Ray Vaughn's version.

In terms of pure electric blues playing, Winter's skill level is up there with Eric Clapton and Vaughn. Why he hasn't gotten more recognition is anybody's guess.

In the jazz category this week, Legacy has released Live At Carnegie Hall from the late Coltrane mentor, Dexter Gordon.

Though he passed away in 1990 and his career was probably at its height in the '50s, Dexter Gordon's influence can be heard in everyone from Stan Getz, John Coltrane or Sonny Rollins to anyone coming up today. This 1978 live recording captures the tenor-player after 14 years of having played and garnered a following in Europe, and it offers great insight into the be-bop movement, prior to the eruption of avant garde.

The CD is made up of five 10-minute-plus tracks that all involve Gordon improvising relentlessly for what seem like endless periods of time. Secret Love, the first cut, sounds as if Gordon's horn is not being played, but used as a voice, smooth and sweet, tightly holding onto every note and every phrase — the entire recording is like this.

The End Of A Love Affair sounds like Gordon's young rhythm section is fighting to keep up with him and barely succeeding — the man could fly. Blues Up And Down and Cheesecake see Gordon dueling with fellow tenorman, Johnny Griffin, both of whom are equally fast with their fingers, causing the duel to revert to who can create the strangest sounds in the midst of furiously executed phrases.

Overall, Live At Carnegie Hall is a very solid recording from a very influential player. It is not experimental or avant garde, just straight ahead, non-stop, precision improvisation.

close out the half with a goal to push Dartmouth's lead to three at 8–5. Opening the second half, Fenwick provided a virtual instant replay of Frazier's opening charge with her own march through the UMass defense and put a shot past Nardi after 12 seconds into the game. Following Fenwick was Weitzal with four goals and senior attack Jen Greene with three assists.

On both sides of the field, Dartmouth showed no qualms concerning the physicality of their play. As their sticks flew freely and their shoulders lowered liberally, the Minutewomen were finding out what it felt like to play a team that had the pressure and ability of defending their national ranking.

"I thought we got some really nice support from our bench today when we needed it," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "This was a tough team. They were beatable defensively and we certainly showed them that. I think we just needed to step up a little more defensively."

UMass would ultimately be done in after sharp stick handling and well timed passing on the part of the Big Green.

"It was a tough loss," McClellan said. "I think we're playing a little flat since our win over Brown. We're going to have to pick ourselves up and get down to business the rest of this season. I was hoping we'd play a little sharper today although we did some very nice things and [we had our] moments."

The strain of playing a team with the weapons like Dartmouth had could be seen on many Minutewomen faces at the start of the second half.

"They've got a lot of depth, they've got a lot of size, speed, and skill," McClellan said. "They sort of have a little bit of everything in each department. Now it's time for us to get down to business for St. Joseph's, Hofstra, BU, and Syracuse. They're the real coin toss teams that we're going to have to come out passionately for."

during the rest of the week as well, trying to keep the team focused and with good perspective.

"With a young team like this, you have to do a lot of talking about their heads and how they're approaching things mentally, in practices and games," McClellan said. "This is a sort of midseason rut and we talked about that yesterday."

The key for the freshman and sophomores is how they will respond in the coming weeks. The next two opponents, St. Joseph's and Hofstra, both on the road, will prove to be challenging games for the Minutewomen. Both are projected as beatable teams, but the hills and valleys indicative of any growing season might give UMass some trouble come game time. Still, in the best position it's been in years, Massachusetts cannot complain about its youth.

The UMass co-ed cheerleading team brought home ninth place from the Nationals in Daytona Beach, Fla.

Cheerleaders place at Nationals

UMass sent two cheerleading squads to national competition in Daytona Beach, Fla., April 2–3 and both came home with top 10 awards. The all-girl team took home fifth place, and the co–ed team finished ninth.

The teams qualified during a camp in Port Jervis, N.J. last August and competed against 19 teams in each division.

After preliminary round action, the all–girl squad, which has 20 members, stood in third place, while the co–ed team, comprised of 10 women and 10 men, was in fourth. Both advanced to final competition.

The UMass Dance team, which also traveled to Florida, finished 11th in preliminaries and did not advance.

After the finals competitions, the all–girl team was awarded fifth and the co–ed ninth.

The Nationals will be aired on CBS April 19 at 2 p.m. UMass' division will be aired on USA Network on May 2 at 12 p.m.

Club lacrosse picks up win at Williams

It was a all–around team effort for the UMass club lacrosse team as it traveled to Williamstown to hand the Williams College junior varsity a tough 16–3 loss on April 7.

Ground balls keyed the game as Tim Kostek, Brendan Keenan, patrice Bernadel and Owen Poland created opportunities for UMass.

UMass took advantage of those opportunities, scoring 10 assisted goals. In all, 10 different players tallied points on the afternoon. Kevin Murray led the way with six points, while Gabe Maetz. Levance Eustay and Poland all added four. Keenan contributed two points.

UMass also got its fair share of individual goals from Kostek, Mike Dyer, Tim Mooney, Mike Murray and defenseman Juan–Pablo Mas.

On the defensive side of the field, Mas teamed with Tom Schauweker and Erik Becker to shut down the Williams offense. Phuc Thai and Mike Nowlan anchored the defense with their play in goal.

UMass plays next on April 11 at Dean Junior College, the reigning league champion.

For more information about the club lacrosse team, contact Judy Dietel at 545–3815.

Club volleyball heads to Nationals

The 18th–ranked UMass men's club volleyball team will head to Austin, Texas for Nationals next week after finishing the New England regular season undefeated.

On April 4, the team competed in the New England Championships against Rhode Island, Dartmouth, Amherst, Colby, Providence, Southern Connecticut, New Hampshire, MIT, Vermont and Western Connecticut.

After moving through pool play, UMass knocked off URI, 15–3, 15–5 in the semifinals and UNH, 15–7, 15–8 in the finals.

Michael Shippee, Wayne Chestna, Jason Greenlaw and Eric Blahut were tabbed as some of the tournament's top performers. Also contributing for UMass were Jaret Balter, Jeff Zima, Damian Gasparatto, Jason Telfes, Shawn Daly, Pedro Fernandes, Nick Bryan and Rob Settembro.

The UMass women's club volleyball team finished 2–6 in pool play at Boston University, and earned a split with No. 10 BU, 15–12, 13–15. The women will also travel to Austin next week for Nationals.

Women's hockey ends season at Nationals

The UMass women's hockey team earned a respectable fourth–place finish at the National Club Championships, March 22–24 in Lake Placid, N.Y. The team's leading scorer, Jenna Nolan, was honored as an All–Tournament team. UMass finished the season with a 14–6–3 record.

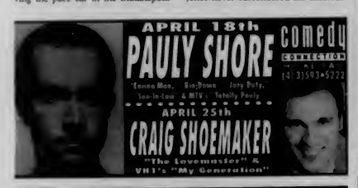
Kuchar taking it all in at The Masters

AUGUSTA, Ga. (AP) — Matt Kuchar munched on a sandwich and potato chips yesterday in the section of the Augusta National clubhouse marked "Players Only."

To his left, John Daly puffed on a cigarette. To his right, Phil Mickelson glanced at a newspaper. Davis Love III settled into a seat right across the table, then Greg Norman joined the group a few minutes later.

Kuchar's eyes, wide and alive, wandered back and forth, soaking it all in.

"It was great to hear their stories," the 19-year-old Georgia Tech sophomore said. "John Daly was telling some funny stories about his days in college. Greg Norman started talking about all his toys and how he's driving the pace car in the Indianapolis 500."



Kuchar is this year's Tiger Woods — invited to the Masters as the reigning U.S. Amateur champion. But unlike the hoopla that followed Woods from the very first day he stepped inside the gates at Augusta National, Kuchar slinks around the grounds in virtual obscurity.

"I just came in at the right time and at the right place," said Kuchar, who surprised even himself by winning the U.S. Amateur title in August. "I'm kind of riding his wave. Tiger has made golf so much more popular. For me to follow in his footsteps is lucky."

This week, the cheers for Kuchar have been respectful — after all, Augusta National co-founder Bobby Jones never surrendered his amateur status — but more of the furor is reserved for players like Woods and Elk, Fakdo and Norman, Nicklaus and Palmer.

This is the true amateur experience at the Masters, which went through an anomoly during Woods' three years as an amateur champion. Guys like Kuchar, one of five amateurs in the 88-player field, are here to immerse themselves in the experience, immune to the hordes of media and fans.

Nothing is too mundane, from sleeping in the dorm-like austerity of the Crow's Nest to glancing out from the veranda at the hordes of people already gathered on the course in the early-morning mist.

mer who died, what Casey Martin's trial meant to golf), ESPN has shown little hint of heading in that direction.

With ESPN already issuing two editions of its ESPN Magazine, they have become the new kids on the block. If you ever had a new neighbor move in next to or near you when you were younger, you can probably recall that they tried to impress quickly. Maybe it was your new friend's dad showing off his brand new GrillMaster 5000 to your pop or being able to play with every toy you though could exist. If you didn't realize it then, you probably do now: it's called insecurity.

While I don't want to trash the concept of ESPN Magazine there are flaws. With all its bells and whistles, they have forced out the content, which Sports Illustrated has faithfully provided throughout the years. Yes, change is good. Yes, hopefully it will mean progress in some respects. But when you have the "new kid" being billed as "all nude," you may encounter a few problems somewhere down the line.

I expected no less from ESPN. Well known, in part, for its witty and creative show "SportsCenter," it was inevitable that the same type of pop and pizazz would turn up in what could be considered its print edition. The error, however, lies within the assumption of "SportsCenter's" flash carrying over and being transplanted into a magazine. While I would eagerly awake for a 6 a.m. edition of "SportsCenter," I would be less enthralled with the assault on the senses emanating from the next issue of ESPN Magazine.

While it does boast great photography and excellent writers, they are unfortunately drowned out by the blatant pandering to the younger generation and the waste of large pages of grown men grabbing each other or wincing in pain and holding their groin.

The content that does impress unfortunately seems out of place. An artistic 76ers–Spurs photo featuring Tim Duncan and Allen Iverson just somehow doesn't jive with a naked Michael Johnson as we get to witness the "evolution of skin." While this is only an advertisement and not the content of the magazine, characteristics spill over.

ESPN Magazine seems to have been caught between providing content and image. While the effort should be applauded, we can how the lighter side of sports presented in what looks like a sports atlas may be misguided in its delivery.

Sports Illustrated has the advantage of being a week more timely as ESPN Magazine is less concerned with short–term news, focusing on the bigger picture. It attempts to supplement "SportsCenter" with a look into the future but again, we see a prospect with promise fail to the wayside faster than Brian Bosworth.

In the second issue we see Michael "as [we've] never heard him." Michael talks about his aversion to SI because of tie cover they ran that did not quite endorse his baseball detour entitled "Bag It, Michael!: Jordan and the White Sox are Embarrassing Baseball." Somehow that reaction doesn't fit with his pet saying "I'll get over it."

What about forgive and forget Mike? That's the attitude that pervades throughout this magazine, because it gels with the target audience of rebellious youth. Even the headline of the story, "Flinch First? Not Me." exemplifies the mag's apparent direction of flippancy that spoils the show like eating too much popcorn before seeing Titanic for the umpteenth time.

Not SI, though. We've already got a complete package without the useless wrapping paper that we get with Junior (wrapping paper that comes with loud, ugly graphics, by the way). Sports Illustrated is a classic. Timeless. Peerless.

Except now there's ESPN Magazine: This Week's Sign the Apocalypse is Upon Us.

Jamie Jee and Casey Kune are Collegian columnists.

the St. Joe's all–time assist list with 401, and the same spot on the single season list with 171, which he amassed in his senior year.

Flint has served as the coach of the Minutemen for two years.

Shannon Crooks looking to transfer

St. John's freshman guard Shannon Crooks will likely transfer from the Red Storm at the end of this year, and UMass is a front–runner to land him.

Massachusetts originally recruited Crooks, a product of Everett High School, who instead opted to play in New York City. However, Crooks is now looking to move closer to home because his father has cancer.

Everett High coach John DiBiaso told the Daily Hampshire Gazette this weekend that the Minutemen hold the inside track with Crooks.

"Shannon has a very rapport with Bruiser Flint," DiBiaso said. "Being away from home has been a burden to him. It's just him, his father and his mother, and it's been tough for him to be away."

The 6–foot–2 combo guard averaged 19 points in the 23 games during which he saw limited action.

Due to NCAA rules, no matter where he ends up, Crooks will sit out a year but still retain three years of eligibility.

Recruit considering UConn

Philadelphia product John Salmons is leaning towards Connecticut and may sign with the Huskies if his SAT scores are high enough. UConn and several other high– profile schools will likely extend scholarship offers to Salmons.

The official signing period began yesterday.

Salmons, a 6–foot–7 forward who faced increased interest due to his play this season, may still consider the Minutemen, especially if his scores are not high enough. Several of the schools he is considering do not accept partial or non–qualifiers.

the sports reader wants anymore. Not even the free tokens of appreciation.

If you are any kind of sports fan, you watched the games or you saw the highlights, probably on ESPN's "SportsCenter," and you don't want to rehash them in print. Does it matter that with 10:21 remaining in the second quarter, Danny Ferry left the game with minor back spasms? But this is just the beginning.

Photos. Photos. We've all seen a million action pictures of Michael Jordan driving or dunking on some lost soul or a searing hockey player glaring at his opponent at face–off — yes, they are the standard for good photo–journalism. But don't you think it's time to branch out and update this mindset?

The extra size that many associate with Rolling Stone opens up sports photography to another world. In the April 6 issue of ESPN, pictures include Dominik Hasek sitting spread eagle under the shower (with shorts on), Rey Ordonez surfacing from playful waves at sunset, or our own Pedro Martinez enveloped in flamboyantly dressed dancers. Such pictures will catch the non–fanatic sports fan and force the avid fan to imagine what it has to do with the athlete. It's an art, not just a matter of timeliness.

But the main draw is that it is a welcome influx for the perennial sports fan who doesn't want to focus on just one sport, but also doesn't want to be forced to read about some family of acrobats.

Details, sniffing for little–known facts, that's what sports knowledge has come to today. Sports journalism with an attitude. It reflects many of our athletes today and we should be able to have a medium which will provide us with opinions of "guys who go to the trainer's room only for Advil." We want to hear the human side of athletes, their sense of humor, and outlook on their team. Not stale lines about working everyday to make the playoffs. I think that gameplan was well established back when Doubleday created the game.

When much of sports is based on preposterous salary rejections, intra–team gawking, and ownership discrepancies, attitude is needed. ESPN Magazine creates and elaborates on the controversy that holds sports together. Fans thrive on the dirt.

Sports Illustrated doesn't let fans have opinions on topics. Instead, they reiterate what newspapers write and add unbearable blandness to an already sour story.

In today's fast–paced world, if something doesn't catch our initial attention, then we won't read it. Sports Illustrated is loaded with epic stories on the WHA or Tara Lipinski that the average reader will get halfway through and then decide on sleep instead. ESPN Magazine is short and to the point. Flashy gimmicks and charts are mixed with a real knowledge of sports from the people who know them most.

ESPN Magazine unveils the world of sports that we don't see through the rest of mass media. ESPN took a chance with this publication. This trio believes it's a sleeper that will soon dethrone the flavorless giant known as Sports Illustrated.

Orioles again have chance to make noise in AL East

BALTIMORE (AP) — The Baltimore Orioles last year made history by becoming only the sixth team in baseball history to remain in first place the entire season.

Any chance this year's team had of an encore dissipated opening day with a 4–1 loss to Kansas City. But the Orioles have won every game since, and after seven games they've got a better record than the 1997 squad that won 98 games and went to the AL championship series.

This is the fourth time in franchise history Baltimore has started 6–1. In 1966 and 1971 the Orioles reached the World Series, and in 1996 Baltimore made it to the AL CS as a wild card.

Although it's far too early for Baltimore to start penning playoff tickets, the Orioles have at least given the other teams in the AL East something to think about.

Baltimore has scored at least 10 runs three times during its six–game winning streak. The Orioles have also won twice by one run, including a 4–3 win over the Royals in which Baltimore rallied to score four runs in the bottom of the ninth.

The pitchers have allowed an average of only three runs per game and the hitters have repeatedly displayed their ability to come through in the clutch — the Orioles have scored a whopping 48 percent of their 44 runs with two outs.

"We can't go wire–to–wire, we proved that opening day," manager Ray Miller said. "But to win the tough games, that makes everybody kind of relaxed. We know that if we can't outslug them, we can do the little things and win with our pitching."

The Orioles climbed into first place in the AL East after their fourth game and appear intent upon staying there.

"We're getting timely hitting, playing good defense and getting what we need from our pitchers," Miller told Reboulet said. "We wanted to get off to a good start, and so far that's exactly what's happened."

The Orioles still have 155 games left, and it would be absurd to draw any conclusions after just seven games against Kansas City and Detroit. But it already appears evident Miller will benefit greatly from having the most expensive 25–man roster in baseball history at his disposal.

After leadoff batter Brady Anderson hurt his shoulder Saturday, Miller placed Jeffrey Hammonds atop the order against the Tigers on Sunday and inserted Roberto Alomar in the No. 1 spot Tuesday.

"5 reasons why you should take my GRE course."
–John Katzman, Founder & President of The Princeton Review
1. Class time that counts. We spend more time in class to make sure we cover the test exhaustively. You won't have to spend hours working on your own. Class size is limited to 15.
2. You'll score more... Our students improve an average of 212 points on the GRE
3. If you knew the CAT. No one knows the computer adaptive tests better than we do. So, whether you choose the pencil & paper or CAT format, you'll review powerful techniques to maximize your score.
4. We're on campus! The Princeton Review was chosen to administer all test-preparation programs for the UMASS Division of Continuing Education. No traveling, no hassle.
5. Satisfaction guaranteed. If you complete the course, take the GRE and are not satisfied with your score, we'll work with you again for up to one year, at no fee.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Take care you don't say the wrong thing at the wrong time today. Offer information when required, hold your tongue otherwise.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Some may be entertained by your antics today, but others may feel that you are acting inappropriately. You needn't cut loose quite so much!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Environmental influences are too much to ignore today. You are going to have to adjust your schedule and activities accordingly.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Travel plans? You had better be prepared to follow and alternate route, as the one you had laid out for yourself is fraught with pitfalls.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may want to be more aggressive in your approach today. There are those who may be rubbed the wrong way, but overall, you should be successful.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You can capitalize on a sudden, unexpected development today, but you must be ready and willing to act immediately. Delays render you powerless.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — It shouldn't take long for you to make your mark today. Once others are looking in your direction, you can slow down and make a show of your work.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may be tempted to pursue something dangerous today, but with the subtle assistance of a close friend all should turn out well.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Your head and your heart may not be working together today. See if you can't reconcile what you are thinking with how you are feeling.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may not be able to resist doing something that you know will be considered wrong by some of the people around you. Hold your course.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — Speed must not be allowed to put quality of work in jeopardy today. If you must, slow down and make sure that everything is being done right.

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — You may find that you're in control of something that you don't understand. You must be willing to ask for assistance when the time is right.

Women's lax falls to No. 11 Dartmouth

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

Sometimes it's just time to move on. Most members of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team seemed to realize that near the end of their 16–7 loss to No. 11 Dartmouth (5–1) yesterday at Totman Field. UMass fell to 4–3 with the defeat.

The Big Green got down to business early as sophomore midfielder Melissa Frazier scored on starting freshman goaltender Jen Nardi with a mere 10 seconds elapsed in the game.

Dartmouth	16

Dartmouth returned after that goal with a consistently aggressive offensive attack, but Nardi made two solid saves, one on a wide–open point blank shot by a breaking attack. The Big Green defense continued to set up their teammates for scoring opportunities and sophomore Emily Fenwick eventually found an open shot with less than five minutes played in the first half, and snuck it past Nardi for the first of her five scores on the day.

At the 24:15 mark in the opening half, sophomore midfielder Noelle Gorski set up senior midfielder Jen Herker to put the Minutewomen on the board. Herker led the way with two goals followed by five others with one each. After UMass pulled to within a goal, Dartmouth reeled off three more, with sophomore midfielder Jacque Weitzel scoring on back–to–back drives.

UMass then responded starting with a nice move by sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick as she barged past a wall of defenders to sling a shot over freshman Big Green goaltender Ellie Leahy's left shoulder. Gorski then followed with her own scoring attack and both teams alternated pairs of goals as junior attack Laura Koruiz jabbed into the Dartmouth defense and then circled out and around to position herself for a score with 2:27 remaining in the half. Herker followed nine seconds later with her record, coming off a Gorski assist.

That would be as close as the Minutewomen would get, however, as Fenwick spurred on a furious attack by the Big Green. Fenwick would

Inexperience hurts now, but bodes well for future

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

What is sometimes forgotten about the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team is that it is a very young team. Even though the Minutewomen are 4–3 on the year — easily the best season–opening record since their reinstatement in 1992 — and have shown a certain maturity in two double overtime victories against strong opponents, they are still very capable of rookie mistakes. The Minutewomen are still growing towards their peak.

Seven of the UMass starters against Dartmouth were sophomores or younger, including two freshmen, Denise Brey and Jen Nardi. Noelle Gorski and Stephanie Pavlick are among those sophomores who not only got on the score sheet against the Big Green, but have been offensive threats all season. First–year player Fay Naher has also shown that she can be a presence as a newcomer, as her goal yesterday brought her season tally up to 10, good for third place on the team.

Coach Francesca McClellan also needs to rely on freshman Tara Durkin, who splits time between the pipes with Nardi, and has built a 2–0 record on the year.

However, with that talent, there is some inexperience.

"We're expecting senior and junior performances from freshmen and sophomores," McClellan said. "There's no doubt that we're really asking for maximum performance and consistency in performances and we're bound to get some lumps. Did we see some of that inconsistency today? I don't know. Did I think anyone had a disastrous performance? No."

Often times against Dartmouth, the No. 12 team in the nation, the Minutewomen looked as though they lost track of the more savvy Big Green players. And although at times she seemed impenetrable, Nardi sometimes appeared "green" in her own right as the opposition capitalized on a number of soft goals.

There were several shining moments by the underclassmen, however. At the 17:18 mark in the first half, Pavlick wound around two defenders from the right side to create an open shot for herself. That score pulled UMass to within three points, 5–2.

It was also a sophomore, Gorski, who cut that lead to two goals by putting the ball in the Dartmouth net roughly four minutes later.

In fact, at one point in time, the younger Massachusetts group was seriously challenging their ranked visitors, as they were only behind by a competitive score of 7–5 as late as 1:06 in the first half.

Still, the Minutewomen showed that they have some room to improve, as they did not score again until almost 19 minutes had ticked away in the second half. UMass seemed unsure of itself as the confident Big Green scored twice in the opening minute after half–time as part of a dominating stretch of nine unanswered goals.

During that stretch, Massachusetts became easily frustrated, letting the Dartmouth momentum snowball instead of digging in and slowing the game down, as perhaps an older might.

Along with dealing with her squad's youth during the course of the game, McClellan must keep on top of them

Weeks goes to Slamm, Flint gets place in Hall

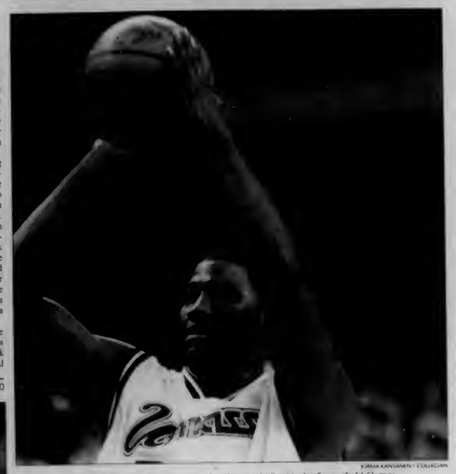
By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Tyrone Weeks decided not to wait until the NBA draft to try his hand at professional basketball. The Massachusetts men's basketball senior forward joined the Springfield Slamm, Western Massachusetts' Eastern Basketball Alliance affiliate, shortly after spring break.

Weeks and the Minutemen finished their season over the break with a loss to Saint Louis in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

Weeks, who has only played in the Slamm's home games, has not given up on the NBA. Last week he missed Springfield's game in order to attend the Portsmouth (Va.) draft camp.

According to the USA Today's web site, Weeks was not among the top four in either the scoring or rebounding categories and was not invited to the Phoenix draft camp.



While with the Slamm, Weeks plays alongside former UMass players Rigo Nunez and Mike Williams.

Flint to be inducted into St. Joe's Hall of Fame

UMass coach Bruiser Flint will receive personal recognition next week for his work on the court, but not on the sidelines.

The former Hawk will be inducted into the St. Joseph's Athletic Hall of Fame next week for what he accomplished at the school as a player.

A 1987 graduate of St. Joe's, Flint averaged 14.6 points per game, while leading the Atlantic 10 with 6.1 assists per game as a senior. He earned second team All–Conference accolades in leading his team to the A–10 title and an NCAA berth that year. Flint holds the fifth–place spot on

SI & ESPN: A classic vs. an upstart

Sports Illustrated is truly a "tastefully done" sports mag

Casey Kane & Jamie Jee

There's a reason Sports Illustrated is considered the king of sports magazines. It's the best. Plain and simple. And part of being the best has been because SI has been able to weather the storm of every other new flavor of the month sports publication.

So it was no surprise months ago when ESPN announced it was going to produce a semi–weekly magazine that everyone immediately started the rivalry whispers. It was no surprise that ESPN is targeting the younger, hipper crowd, leaving today's youth to think of Sports Illustrated as your father's sports mag.

Instead, two weeks into its publication and it's already been two weeks too many. Where Sports Illustrated has probing features, invigorating game stories, highlight and lowlights, reviews and previews, analysis, commentary and exemplary photos, ESPN Magazine has color and loud graphics and color and loud graphics and pictures and loud color graphic pictures.

Get the point?

Sports Illustrated is the classic sports magazine, not just because of the swimsuit issue. It features some of the nation's best reporters — many of whom balked at the opportunity to get in on ESPN's ground level — who give in–depth reports on sports topics around the world.

ESPN Magazine gives the readers exactly what an ESPN viewer would get on "SportsCenter." a short, rather shallow look at today's hot topic. Oh, but the sport better be mainstream if it wants recognition. At least so far. While SI isn't afraid to go deeper into issues affecting today's sporting and sports viewing public (including pieces on steroid use and abuse in sports, a story years back about a Notre Dame swim–

ESPN Magazine offers readers a flashy alternative

Kathleen Ralls, Aaron Saykin & Brett Mauser

There's nothing like going to grandpa's house. Where else can you savor a moth–ball aroma while enjoying all those farm–old–people magazines on his coffee table? It's always the same ones, too — Reader's Digest, The New Yorker, Golf Digest, Bladder Control, and even Sports Illustrated. Yes, Sports Illustrated.

The most popular periodical in American sports history can get a bit old and out of touch with the contemporary readers. ESPN Magazine is a simple, bi–weekly solution for those of you who are sick and tired of reading articles by the same old writers, who have been utilizing the same style of writing since Gordie began his professional hockey career (that was in the 1940's, if you can believe it).

In case you have not already noticed, UMass cable isn't exactly a turn–on (how ironic — TV doing the turning on, that's what Honors 292W can do to your mind). At any rate, CNN/SI is getting old, nauseatingly old, and so are the Sports Illustrated writers and their two–minute commentaries. Those of you who live off campus have the luxury of tuning in to ESPN, but those of us stuck on campus now have an alternative. ESPN's magazine is much like its programs: informative, intoxicating (without alcohol), and above all, funny.

ESPN Magazine pools together some of the top sports journalists in the country to voice their opinion. Attitude and taking stances is key to holding a reader's interest. SI fills heads with the same old thing, week in and week out, lacking anything that resembles an personal thought.

The most beautiful thing about this new magazine is that it's only 50 cents per issues for their inaugural year. Twenty–six issues for only 13 bucks. SI goes for about triple that. For a college student, a bargain is music to the ears. Can I get a witness from the congregation?

Some of lifetime SI subscribers might be unwilling to make the switch or even to look at ESPN Magazine without begrudging eyes. You annually write "I, Renew SI" at the top of your Dear Santa Claus, or other holiday wish list and pray your parents don't order you the package in which you get your free SI white, Haynes, XXL sweatshirt that you always see husbands on television exclaiming "Just what I wanted!" to their wives as they try it on with forced glee. This is just the point with Sports Illustrated, it's not what

Albanians march for independence

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia (AP) — Chanting "Freedom!" and "Independence!," thousands of Kosovo Albanians marched yesterday to protest Serbian rule.

The protest was organized by leading ethnic Albanian political parties and student and workers' unions in Kosovo, an increasingly restive province in southern Serbia. It was denounced by Serbia's state–run TV as a "show" staged by "separatists and terrorists."

Flashing victory signs, the protesters marched through the provincial capital, Pristina, carrying banners saying "Peace, Freedom, Independence," and singing "Give Peace a Chance." Police estimated the crowd at 30,000.

The protest was the latest of several in recent weeks by independence–minded ethnic Albanians, who comprise 90 percent of the population in Kosovo and are increasingly angry at Serbia's strong–arm rule.

At least 80 ethnic Albanians died last month in a Serb police sweep of several Kosovo villages, which the Serb police claimed were the command centers of Albanian militants. The march was the fourth major protest in Pristina since then, and the third without major police intervention.

Standoff at school after student pulls gun

POCATELLO, Idaho (AP) — A 14–year–old student at a school for troubled youths pulled a gun on the principal yesterday, and then holed up inside with five other students. The principal escaped unharmed. Initially, police believed several students and possibly a teacher were being held hostage at The Alternative School by the boy, who fired a shot into a wall or ceiling and demanded cigarettes and alcohol. But nearly three hours later, police Lt. Garry Pritchett said none of the five students with the 14–year–old was considered a hostage. There were no reports of injuries. He said a psychiatrist was talking to the boy.

The area around the school was cordoned off, and homes within a block were evacuated after the incident began about 8:30 a.m. MDT. A SWAT team was on the scene.

About 90 minutes into the standoff, somebody stepped outside and placed a gun on the ground. A short time later, a person — it was unclear if it was the same one — kicked the gun further away. Pritchett said the 14–year–old, who remained armed with another weapon, had swapped a .22–caliber semiautomatic pistol for packages of cigarettes from police.

Police said the youth had threatened principal Paul Matthews on Wednesday. The boy returned yesterday and pulled a weapon on Matthews, who threw up a table between them and was able to order students to evacuate, Matthews said.

Vision 2000 approved at Faculty Senate meeting

By Victoria Graves
Collegian Staff

Vision 2000, a resolution to improve gender inequities at New England Land–Grant universities was approved by the University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate at yesterday's meeting amid great debate.

Eventually, the motion was passed to include nine amended recommendations and two points concerning the University's non–discrimination policy.

The Rules Committee collected recommendations from various councils and committees to create a motion to substitute the original Vision 2000 motion. Changing it to include only the nine recommendations from the document, it included actions to encourage women's academic and career development and encourage full integration into the curriculum of relevant scholarship and texts by and about women.

"The Rules Committee is trying to act as a vehicle and represent senate councils and committees," said Joseph Larson, chair of the Rules Committee.

Senator Jeffrey Sedgwick proposed an alternate motion to strike Vision 2000 and simply recognize the University's non–discrimination policy, celebrate the progress that has been made under the policy, and reaffirm commitment to it.

"This campus has reason to celebrate... shouldn't we admit we have a non–discrimination policy and celebrate that fact?" said Sedgwick.

Only the final two points were finally added to the motion.

Many senators agreed with Sedgwick, concerned with the impact the document would have on the university and questioned its necessity.

"It's in the best interest of the University to disassociate itself from Vision 2000. It's seriously flawed," said Sen. Edward Connors.

Agreeing that the University has improved in recent years regarding its treatment of women, other senators felt that this was no reason to stop trying to progress further.

"The basic document built out of this was a UMass document. We can't disassociate ourselves from it. I'm happy to try to celebrate the success we've had, but we should do better. I'd like to think that most faculty feel this way. Sidestepping the issue will make us look bad," said Sen. Lisa Saunders.

Sen. Joseph Donohue echoed Saunders sentiment.

"I think we should defeat [the amended] motions, not because they are without merit, but I think if we adopt either, we will be sidestepping. We must confront squarely the issues Vision 2000 has set before us. It is not a cosmetic fix," Donohue said.

Other senators felt that Sedgwick's amendment was merely stating what must be done legally anyway, and will not make improvements significantly for women on campus.

"This [amendment] isn't saying anything. I don't feel it's appropriate for our collective body to remain complacent," said Sen. Elisabeth Selkirk.

SGA (Student Government Association) President Amy Pellegrino addressed the senate body with concerns that students lack information about this document and how it will affect them in the future. The senate did not address this statement.

"I'm concerned that it hasn't been presented to the student body or the SGA," Pellegrino said.

Sen. Mary King did acknowledge the strides the University has made, and still debated strongly for the motion's passage.

"Many things are great, but many things are not so great. I find it appalling that my colleagues think we've made such progress that we don't need to adopt this," King said.

Sen. Bracey agreed with King.

"It's a disservice to women on this campus to make light of the way they live. Vision 2000 is what brought us here, and we should associate ourselves with it," Bracey said.

All members of the organization are registered EMTs from Massachusetts or other states; university students certified as EMTs from other states are allowed to work with First Aid Services as well.

The level of care First Aid Services provides is "first responder." They assess the severity of the situation and take the medical precautions they feel is necessary.

UM prof collaborates on book

Susan Landau co-authors book on subject of encryption & privacy

By Jason Eiseman

As the Internet has grown and developed so have the issues concerning privacy and security.

Security can be compromised when the Internet is used to purchase products, transmit sensitive information, such as logging onto the Internet and sending a simple e–mail. How can we know if our privacy is being protected?

One University of Massachusetts professor has co–authored a book on the subject of privacy and security. Susan Landau, professor of computer science, is the author of Privacy on the Line: The Politics of Wiretapping and Encryption, along with Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) professor Whitfield Diffie.

The book, published by the MIT Press, deals with issues of encryption with respect to privacy and security issues. Landau used UMass e–mail accounts as an example of how encryption works.

"When you type in your password for your computer, the computer does not recognize your password. The password records are stored in encryption," Landau said.

She said the password goes through a "hash," a very complex function which is very difficult to decrypt. She said the computer only remembers the result of the password once it has gone through the function, therefore protecting privacy for the individual and security for the entire system.

"There are other forms of encryption that ought to be used," Landau said. The security of the system could be compromised because of the lack of security when students enter their e–mail accounts from "remote" or off–campus terminals. Landau said there are other ways the campus could improve on the privacy of students.

"It's completely inappropriate that one's social security number as an ID," Landau said. With access to a person's social security number, any number of problems can arise. With a stolen social security number a credit account can be started in someone else's name. It can affect their taxes, and a lot of other private information can be divulged with a social security number.

"They don't force you to," Landau said. "I don't have

Man charged with killing two of five women slain

By Trudy Tynan
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — A 31–year–old Springfield handyman was charged yesterday in the murders of two of five women slain in the city over the past six months.

Hampden County District Attorney William Bennett said DNA evidence links Alfred J. Gaynor to the deaths of Joyce Dickerson and Rosemary Downs, both of whom were strangled.

Authorities have not obtained evidence directly connecting the slayings with the deaths of the three other Springfield women, who have all been strangled since October, Bennett said.

However, Police Chief Paula Meara said Gaynor has not been ruled out in the other slayings and police sources said he remains a suspect in the investigation.

Gaynor pleaded innocent at his arraignment in Springfield District Court on two counts of murder. Judge Robert Kumor ordered him held without bail pending a pretrial conference on April 30. Security was tight as the burly 6–footer was led into the packed courtroom in leg shackles and handcuffs. Meara sat with family members of the victims.

Earlier, Dickerson's mother, Helen Strickland of Brockton, said the arrest late Wednesday brought her some relief after weeks of worry.

"This is the first night I really can get some sleep," she said.

Dickerson's frozen body was found March 11 near an abandoned restaurant in downtown Springfield, three weeks after the 37–year–old mother of two disappeared from her home. Downs, 43, was found naked and dead in the bedroom of her Springfield apartment Feb. 11.

Bennett described Gaynor, who had been under surveillance for some time, as a cocaine user, who had shared crack cocaine with the victims. He said autopsies showed both women had used the drug shortly before they were killed.

Semen samples linked Gaynor to the scene of both murders, Bennett said. And Gaynor had pawned some of Dickerson's jewelry in the weeks between her disappearance and the discovery of her body. Investigators believe Dickerson was killed shortly after she left home for a night out on Feb. 18. Her empty car was found parked nearby the next day with blood and semen stains on the seat. Bennett said the blood was determined to be hers.

Sex was involved in both killings, Bennett said, but the only charges that have been filed against Gaynor are two counts of murder. He was acquitted in a Springfield rape case last year. Gaynor's mother, Phathia M. Gaynor, said her son, who did odd jobs around the city, was innocent and had "been in the wrong place at the wrong time."

She said he came under suspicion after telling police he had been with Dickerson before she disappeared.

Bennett said Gaynor voluntarily provided authorities with a blood sample that was used for DNA tests. He declined to comment on whether Gaynor had known the other victims or their families. The killings spread a wave of fear through the city. And many women said yesterday that they were still nervous.

"There's a little bit of a sense of relief, but I can't relax. It's not over. They still haven't made an arrest in the other killings," said Glenda Hopper, who had gone to high school with one of the other victims and had also known Downs. "Every time my two daughters are away from home I worry."

All five of the women had links to cocaine use, all were asphyxiated in various ways and found at least partially undressed, police said.

478 patients; most of them coming from big events, like 12 patients at last year's commencement.

Reisman said they had nine patients at the Ani DiFranco Concert last Saturday, including five drug and alcohol related problems — four of which were underage.

Reisman said It is not the job of EMTs to act as police, only to help save lives.

"Anything where people are going to drink, anything where people are going to fight, we have workers," Reisman said.

EMTs from First Aid Services also teach first aid and CPR courses to anyone who wishes to get certified.

"We do classes for anyone who calls," Reisman said. First Aid Services recently trained Dining Commons workers and all hotel restaurant and travel administration majors. They also had a call from a fraternity and will move equipment to the fraternity house where they will certify members in CPR.

First Aid Services is having trouble finding members at the moment.

"We have very low membership right now," Reisman said. "Keeping your EMT is very difficult," he said.

EMTs must go through continuing education classes and training which First Aid Services does provide for its members. A lot of training and education is provided by the Amherst Fire Department, who works closely with First Aid Services.

Reisman also credited the Environmental Health and Safety office for paying First Aid Services and supporting them.

"Any student can join the RSO, but only EMTs can work," Lukas Snurm, senior landscape architecture major, and member of First Aid Services, said. "Anyone can be a member and participate in the classes."

Reisman said people join for different reasons.

"I just got this sudden urge to help people," Reisman said. "It's a great way to build confidence within yourself."

Snurm received his EMT certification when he dropped out for a semester, and began working for the First Aid unit upon his return to the university.

Candice Foster, junior exercise science and health and wellness major, said she became interested in First Aid Services through her experience in the nursing program.

"I was a nursing student for three and a half years, and got my EMT as a sophomore," Foster said.

In addition to working as first responders at campus events and teaching classes for the campus community, First Aid Service also sponsors blood drives with the American Red Cross.

The unit is also currently submitting a grant proposal to get two defibrillators to increase the effectiveness of their response.

Along with Reisman, the unit is structured with four other directors: Cynthia Strock, Director of Training; Leo Phoenix, Director of Operations; Cheyenne Ferro; Director of Administration and Scott Walker is Director of Special Projects.

my social security number as my identifier."

According to federal law the only time a person is required to give their social security number away is to an employer for their taxes.

"Lots of people ask for it, but they're not entitled to the information," she said.

Landau personally tests out encryption devices. She has an encryption device on her desk which prevents eavesdroppers from listening in on her conversations. The device, about the size of a video cassette is a 168 bit encryption device, which, according to Landau, is virtually unbreakable. She said the device prevents eavesdroppers from being able to understand the conversation going on. She only uses the device to test how it works.

"I don't work on things that I think really need to be protected against eavesdroppers," Landau said.

Most of Landau's work is with the mathematics of encryption. She said she was inspired by "elegant mathematics" which are related to encryption.

She said the need for encryption has grown with the World Wide Web and its use for international business.

"With the growth of the Web, growth of the Internet, growth of international business has fueled the need for encryption," she said.

Landau said the future of encryption technology will be a fight between domestic companies and foreign companies. She said there are controls on certain encryption technologies that can be exported from this country, but many foreign companies can sell the most advanced of these technologies in the U.S.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) is fighting to put restrictions on the encryption devices brought into this country, and produced by domestic companies.

According to Landau, the FBI claims these devices restrict their investigations, particularly with wiretaps. She said civil liberties groups and computer companies are lobbying against the FBI.

"It's the FBI against the rest, but the FBI has a lot of clout," Landau said.

A study which was recently released stated that U.S. companies will lose $35 billion if they can't include strong encryption devices in their products, because they will lose business to foreign competitors.

Twisters kill 24 in Ala.

By Jay Reeves
Associated Press

ROCK CREEK, Ala. — A mournful wail went out over a rural Alabama community laid waste by a killer tornado.

"Mama, where are you? Where are the houses?" a girl called through sobs.

"I'm here," her mother replied in the darkness, through tears of her own. "The houses are gone."

A twister that killed at least 24 people and injured more than 160 others across central Alabama late Wednesday left a wide path of destruction — both physical and emotional.

In Rock Creek, a tiny community about 30 miles west of Birmingham, the bodies of victims littered the landscape like splintered trees.

Three corpses — apparently those of two adults and a child — were covered with blankets along the shoulder of the main street through town. Another body was suspended in a treetop. Another was in a car. Searchers looked for yet another in the woods.

In all, at least 10 people died in Rock Creek, an unincorporated area with a couple of hundred residents.

Survivors walked down darkened streets with blankets draped around their shoulders seeking pieces of their lives. But there was little left.

A huge trampoline was wrapped around a telephone pole. A refrigerator — minus the doors — came to rest in front of a home. A pair of orange-handled scissors lay on blacktop.

Firewood will be cheap next winter. Thousands of trees were twisted off by the tornado, many pulling down power lines as they fell. Flashing emergency beacons provided the only light.

The center of the community, Rock Creek Church of God, was converted into a triage unit. Injured residents lay on pews as a cool breeze blew through the broken windows.

Long after her parents had been taken to a hospital with critical injuries, a girl believed to be less than 1 year old was found lying listlessly at the front of the sanctuary, somehow forgotten in the mayhem.

Red Cross volunteer Susan Sidwell and Jody Melton, a pediatric nurse who lives nearby, gathered up the child and got her help. "We took her in a pickup truck through a pasture, rushing out looking for a doctor," said Ms. Sidwell.

In the April 7 edition of the Collegian, the group Ugli Kids was reported as hailing from Springfield. The group is actually from Cambridge, MA. The Collegian regrets the error.

Drunk driving hits home

Mark Zmarzly

LINCOLN, Neb. — Last Thursday, I pled guilty to driving while intoxicated.

You are supposed to start a column with something that grabs the readers attention, so there it is. This semester I have been writing columns that were fun and interesting for me. This is one column that I wish I had no personal experience with. For two months I've debated even writing it.

After thinking about it further, I decided this column would do more good for the campus than it would cause personal embarrassment for me.

On Feb. 7, I was pulled over by a Lincoln police officer. I had been out drinking with my friends earlier that night and was on my way home. When the officer approached my car I had my license and registration ready for her. It never crossed my mind that I was intoxicated. I was asked if I had been drinking that night. I told the officer I had had a couple of beers. I went through the alphabet and through a series of other tests. At the conclusion of these tests the officer told me she would like me to consent to a Breathalyzer test. I blew over the legal limit for operating a motor vehicle.

Every year you see countless statistics about drinking and driving; statistics that tell you about the amount of money and the number of lives drunken drivers cost this country. These statistics were meaningless to me two months ago. I had never known anyone who was injured by a drunken driver; I had never experienced any loss because of alcohol. Statistics did nothing to sway me from drinking and driving in February.

Having a personal experience with drinking and driving is not something I enjoyed. I have learned to deal with my mistake and see the outcome of such an offense on a personal level. I would like to pass on this information to those of you who don't know the particular punishments that go with a DWI. After I failed my Breathalyzer I was taken to detox. If you want to see what hell is like, just go down to detox for a while.

You enter the holding cell, and all you can smell is urine. I took a seat on the floor in the corner while I waited for my roommate to pick me up. Thank God the other occupants of the cell were sleeping.

About 10 minutes into my stay, a guy stumbled out of the sleeping area and began to pound on the door. He was yelling about his constitutional rights and about false imprisonment. I looked up from the corner at this guy and saw something missing in his eyes. The kind of something that stops a man from killing a guy like me who looks at him funny. Some of the guys running the detox center came in and physically subdued the man. After he calmed down, they left. They left him in there with me. He attempted to make me his new friend. Right about when he was getting irritated again, the door opened and I saw my roommate. If you ever experience some time in detox, you'd think it was punishment enough for any crime.

The next week I hired a lawyer at the bargain price of $250. When I say bargain, I'm not being sarcastic. I got a half-price discount because my lawyer is an alumnus of my fraternity. After being charged with a DWI, you get a temporary license for 30 days. After the 30 days are up you lose your license for 90 days, according to the Department of Motor Vehicles policy. At the end of these 90 days you get to apply for a license reinstatement. The reinstatement fee is $95 plus $15 for a new license. You must take both the written and driving test again. These above mentioned punishments are just from the D.M.V.

The court sanctions are as follows: For a first offense you can get probation for anywhere from three months to a full year, and only if you have no previous infractions. The fine for your first DWI is a minimum of $200 to a maximum of $500. The courts also have a minimum license suspension of 60 days. This can be served simultaneously with the D.M.V. 90-day suspension. Probation is done on a case by case basis. You have to go down to the probation office and fill out this 150-question test to analyze your alcohol and drug problem. The questions on this thing are quite scary. Here's an example: Recently I have felt like I was: a) a danger to myself (suicide), b) a danger to others (homicide), c) both a and b d) neither. Probation consists of a minimum of six Saturday morning alcohol education classes. The same people who answered c to the above question are now sitting to your left and right every Saturday for a month and a half. All of these punishments are nothing compared to the fact that you now have a DWI on your criminal and driving records. A lot of employment opportunities are now shut off to you. Your car insurance is going to skyrocket. People you know won't look at you in the same way they used to. Mentally, you are going to be beating yourself up over the mistake. I am just thankful that I didn't hurt myself or others on that night.

I am on day 32 of 90 without a drivers license, and believe me, it sucks. I will have spent almost $700 before this is over and that doesn't include the insurance increase that will be coming. The next time you see one of your friends attempt to drive after drinking propose the following to him or her: Tell the individual to give you his or her car for 90 days and $700, and then hit them in the head with a hammer. That is what basically happens when you get caught.

That is, if you don't kill someone.

Mark Zmarzly writes for the Daily Nebraskan at the University of Nebraska. This editorial is distributed through the U-Wire service.

Lies, lies, lies

Eric Petersen

I have this nasty habit. I'm sort of ashamed it, but I can't help it.

I... well, I'm a liar.

Actually, it's not really lying; it's more like telling stories that happen to not be true. I'm not trying to impress anybody or deceive anybody. I'm just trying to entertain people... okay, mostly myself. I figure the audience knows I'm kidding because the stories are always so out there. It's just not always a correct assumption.

Let me give you an example. About a year ago I was in my dorm room alone with my roommate's girlfriend. We'll call her Emily instead of using her real name; she's already mad enough at me. We expected my roommate to appear within 10 or 15 minutes, but, for the moment, she sat on his bed, bare-foot, picking her toes.

There was this awkward silence, but I sure didn't want to watch her pick her toes any more than I had to, so I decided to try small talk.

Small talk is strange. Have you ever tried to stop in the middle of small talk and trace the different topics you've covered? Try it. You'll realize you've made the weirdest jumps in topic as though they made perfect sense. A discussion about a recent movie moves into an account of what drunk Uncle Bill did with a lighter and Aunt Evelyn's Persian cat last summer which flows into a description of why you shouldn't sneeze while watching the movie Outbreak in a crowded theater.

I swear, we started with an innocent comment on the weather, flowed through some of the topics above, and finally arrived at my comment that some people believe, and you may have heard this, that it's a sign of good luck to have your second toe longer than your big toe.

Emily stopped picking her toes long enough to show me that her third toe was actually the longest toe on her right foot.

"What's that mean?" she asked.

"That means... uh... you have... Marfan Syndrome," I told her. "We just learned about it in Human Development class in the chapter on birth defects."

Emily's eyes widened, and she stopped picking her toes again.

"What's Marfan Syndrome?"

"Well, it's a birth defect."

"Yeah, but what does it do?"

"Oh, it's got a bunch of symptoms," I said.

"Most of them harmless. The most distinctive is the third toe being the longest toe on one or both feet. It's most common in Caucasians. In fact, people who get it are often unusually fair-skinned. And they are usually blue-eyed and blond, but not always."

I almost lost her with that last part. She raised her eyebrows doubtfully.

"How can your hair color have anything to do with it?" "Have, uh, you ever heard of... cross-over?" I asked her. She shook her head.

"It happens when the sperm and egg cells combine. But what happens is... well, you know how you have genes that are mixed from both of your parents? It's mostly because you're getting genes from both parents, but there's also this Cross-over. Entire sections of some chromosomes will break off and switch with part of another chromosome. The closer two genes are to each other, geographically, the greater the odds that they'll cross-over together. That way, two seemingly unrelated traits stick together. Apparently, the gene for blond hair is really close to the defective gene for Marfan Syndrome."

Marfan Syndrome is a real birth defect, but it doesn't bare much resemblance to what I'd just described. The symptoms I had named described Emily to a T.

"Of course, there is one more symptom," I told her. "If it was completely harmless, they wouldn't call it a syndrome."

"What's the last symptom?"

"It's a heart problem. People with Marfan Syndrome have a little weak spot on their aorta — that's the big vein going into your heart. Anyway, it doesn't appear until the patient is relatively close to full maturity. But they don't know anything's wrong. One day, they're doing something that gets their heart pumping, like playing a sport or running, and the aorta bursts. If the patient knew they had Marfan, they could avoid that kind of thing. They usually don't though, so the life expectancy of people with Marfan is around 20 years."

Emily's jaw dropped.

"Hey, how old are you anyway?" I asked.

"I'm turning 20 in two weeks," she replied.

"Oh," I said, and turned back to my computer.

Soon after, my roommate showed up, and I left. I completely forgot about the conversation until I saw Emily in the hall the next day. She walked up and slapped me soundly across the face.

"They laughed at me," she yelled. "I skipped class and went to Health Services. I walked in, and I said, 'You've got to help me. I have Marfan Syndrome.' And they laughed at me!"

I was shocked that she'd believed me. I felt awful. I felt guilty. I laughed uncontrollably.

Emily slapped me again.

Disney not so innocent...

Jason Eiseman

I hate Disney movies. I'm not afraid to say it.

Disney is tearing our society apart. It teaches our children values that no respectable individual would teach them. It plays at being movies that promote family values, but only succeeds in subverting the values we should be teaching our children.

The ethnocentrism of Disney, and the way in which they co-opt ancient myths and folklore has become so deeply rooted in our culture that it may be impossible to stop them. I boycott Disney movies, and I want to convince others to do the same.

Let's begin with "Snow White." I once saw a quiz show of some sort where one of the questions asked, "In the original Grimm's fable 'Snow White,' what were the names of the seven dwarfs?" The contestant began to mumble something about "Happy, Grumpy, Sleepy, Dopey." The contestant was wrong. He had named all of the seven dwarfs from the Disney movie correctly, but in the original Grimm brothers fairy tale the dwarfs have no names.

This is how deeply this Disney mess has permeated our society. Disney took a fairy tale which had been passed down for hundreds of years and took it upon themselves to change it and make it their own. Worst of all they made it weak, they took what was interesting about "Snow White" and made it lame.

Everyone loved The Little Mermaid, a story originally told by Hans Christian Anderson, but the Disney movie is not the real story of "The Little Mermaid." In the original story she dies at the end. Anderson had written a beautiful, tragic tale and Disney marred it and destroyed it.

Bambi is a classic Disney film. The problem is they took it from a story which had already been published. Many people like the movie Pinocchio but many people don't realize that it was a wonderful story written by an Italian. There are just two of the movies Disney has taken and ruined for generations of children, who, instead of learning the beauty of folklore, will learn Disney's need to make everything conform to their twisted ideals.

Unfortunately Disney is not the only company making movies that deviate from ancient literature. Take First Knight, for example, a horrible movie with former UMass student Richard Gere and James Bond himself Sean Connery. This movie pretends to tell the story of Sir Lancelot and Queen Guenevere. This movie has very little in common with the actual Arthurian legends. The original stories of Lancelot and Guenevere are more beautiful than any hyped up movie vehicle could ever be.

We are not talking about artistic freedom here. We're talking about destroying beautiful legends and literature. We are talking about helping a society flee from it's traditions of oral storytelling and folktales and turning everything into mass media.

Perhaps the worst qualities of Disney movies are the ethnocentrism which is completely blatant. Take Hercules for an example. I never saw the movie, (remember my boycott), but from what I have heard Hades is the bad guy.

In original Greek mythology, Hades is one of the most powerful, revered, respected gods. He is the brother of Zeus. Disney displayed it's ethnocentrism by placing the conception of hell in the movie, because Hades is God of the underworld, on these ancient myths. I just hope they haven't ruined the beauty of Greek mythology for an entire generation of children.

There's also Aladdin, which I refused to see. From what I have heard, the movie does not portray Middle Eastern culture very kindly, and that doesn't surprise me at all. That's what Disney does. It shows a complete disregard for other cultures.

Am I reactionary? Yes, I probably am. Maybe it's because when I was a child I learned about the stories of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table, with classic tales like "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight." As a child, someone read to me the original story of "Pinocchio," which is more spectacular than Disney's version. My mother read to me the original Grimm brothers fairy tales. I learned an appreciation for fables that are lost on a generation weaned on Disney's watered down knock offs.

There is something special about fairy tales which are passed down through an oral tradition before they are ever written down. There's something special about Greek mythology, and the Arthurian legends. When Disney and other movie makers change the substance of these tales, they kill everything that was special about them. They take away the brilliance of folklore; they take something special and make it lame.

Letters to the Editor

More caution needed in editing

To the editor:

I am writing in response to Marty Keane's article "Involvement in Columbia." My complaint is not with the content of the article, but rather with the editing of it.

The country in question is spelt Colombia and not Columbia. This mistake caused me to doubt Mr. Keane's knowledge of the issue at hand. I am not going to take it upon myself to hold responsible for this error, but I do know that it is Mr. Keane's reputation that has been damaged. In order for an individual to speak about a topic, in hopes of gaining respect from his/her audience, he/she should at least know how to spell the topic correctly. My intentions are only that more care be taken when editing an article, by the author as well as the paper's editor. This will hopefully deter future embarrassment by both the Collegian and its authors.

Turning the tables: The feminist art movement

Helena Kvarnstrom

Turn on the television: are you shocked to see a herd of silicone and liposuction-enhanced women jogging nonchalantly across the beach in microscopic swimsuits?

Look at the magazine rack: does it bother you to see the majority of magazines targeted at women bearing headlines such as "10 Days to a Thinner You" and "How to Make Men Want You?"

Look a little higher on the magazine rack, behind the frosted plastic sheet: do the photographs of women in demeaning sexual positions disgust you?

The fact that the majority of people are not particularly distressed over the incessant objectification of women is a deplorable comment on the state of society.

Recognizing the political and social injustices against women in America, feminists began the quest to stifle remaining traces of inequality between the sexes. These women were (and still are) determined that one day little girls will not idolize Barbie with her enormous breasts and minuscule waist, but rather live their own dreams without the confines of gender roles.

While the definition of "feminist" varies greatly, I consider a feminist to be a person who advocates the equal treatment of men and women in both domestic and public life. Through the use of the visual arts, feminist artists have created work which serves to raise awareness about political and social issues relating to women.

As discrimination against women began to be recognized throughout society in the 1970s, a particular sect of artists emerged. This group marked the creation of the Feminist Art Movement.

One reason for female artists' passionate involvement in the movement was the discrimination they faced in the art world. In 1970, a survey of 10 New York City galleries revealed that the work of 190 male artists was displayed, but only 18 female artists' work was displayed. In that same year, women made up 60 percent of all art students, and 50 percent of professional artists.

Disgusted and outraged, an organization called the Guerrilla Girls responded. The Guerrilla Girls were an extremist group of feminists, notorious for rallies in which they concealed their faces behind gorilla masks. These women protested the injustice within the art community by designing posters and billboards with slogans such as "Do Women Have to be Naked to Get into the Met. Museum?" The list continued, "Less than 5 percent of the artists in the Modern Art sections are women, but 85 percent of the nudes are female."

Feminist art is not a manifest commodity, and it cannot be summarized in a single sentence. We can, however, find several recurring themes and images throughout feminist art.

Abortion has been an enormous source of inspiration and conflict within all kinds of art. Shawn Eichman used the actual body of her aborted fetus in her work, demonstrating the idea that her body was her property, and asserting that she had the right to do with it what she wished.

Pushing the controversy of abortion directly in the face of the viewer in such a powerful manner forced both women and men to re-evaluate their own ideologies about the issue. Though met with much criticism (the project was later cited in the Heritage Foundation's list of "misused" National Endowment for the Arts funds), Eichman's work unapologetically put abortion under the microscope.

Sexuality is a critical part of feminist art. Feminist artists often explore the physical state of being female, in order to represent a broader, deeper condition. Menstrual blood, for example, can symbolize fertility and suffering: calling attention to a monthly ritual which affects every woman, yet remains taboo even in today's "liberated" society.

Expanding on Georgia O'Keefe's infamous flower closeup studies, this new generation of artists abstracted female genitals to the point where they could easily be mistaken for flora. This equating of the vagina with a flower can be seen as women finally acknowledging their sex as something beautiful to be celebrated, rather than as a shameful trait.

Breasts, which have been represented for centuries by predominantly male artists in works such as the countless "Madonna and child" paintings, were also abstracted in feminist artworks. In feminist works, breasts were often transformed into fruits, such as apples. This relates a conflicting message; while retaining the theme of fertility through fruit imagery, symbolizing anatomical parts with edible objects implies that the female body is created for the nourishment and pleasure of others. This implication that the female body was somehow public property, was recognized for the first time as not entirely positive.

The notion of women being put on display translates into the concept of rape. This tragedy has been brought to the attention of a wide audience due to its significant place in feminist art. Margaret Harrison's 1978 collage, entitled "Rape," was monumental in its explicit exploration of the topic.

However, the 1983 "Rape" show, begun by Stephanie Blackwood at Ohio State University, was the first major exhibit dedicated exclusively to the issue of rape.

Sue Coe's monumental work, "Bedford Rape," depicted a woman being raped by four men in a bar while 20 watched. Because of its graphic nature, her work produced much controversy. Even more shocking than the painting's image is the fact that it is based on an actual event which took place in Massachusetts.

Rape is not confined to the textbook definition of a man forcing sex upon a woman. It also extends to psychological rape. The feelings of violation forced upon women in everyday society are indescribable. When pornography is an almost socially-accepted part of our culture, when a girl can't walk down a street without having vulgarities directed at her, when the top-rated television show in the world is "Baywatch," it's no wonder women experience insecurity about physical appearance, translating to an overall vulnerability.

By creating works in which feminists turn the tables on traditional low-class nudie-magazine photo shoots, such as Donna Ann Mc-Adams' "Feminists and Porn Stars," women were able to soften the strength of made-for-men pornography.

Female artists transformed porn by first satirizing "regular" porn, calling its crudeness to the media's attention, and making it more of a social stigma. They also created work which represented sex as enjoyable for women as well as men, nullifying the idea that women are merely objects whose sole purpose is to satisfy men. Angela Muriel's "Sheela Na Gigs" portrayed a woman using her genitals as a weapon of sorts, as a source of power.

Homosexuality as subject matter further promoted the notion of "mutual desire" as well as gay and lesbian rights. The stereotype of lesbian feminists being masculine in well- known, but portraying them as sexual beings seemed to humanize them. Work such as "Fierce Pussy," by a Los- Angeles based feminist group, showed lesbians as thinking, feeling human beings rather than the harsh prepackaged picture most envisioned.

With the Wonderbra becoming one of the bestselling undergarments of all time, Playboy subscriptions not showing signs of decrease, and one rape occurring every 30 seconds in America, the gender gap is far from being bridged. Luckily, however, feminist activists have recognized the twisted values we have been taught to adhere to, and have taken it upon themselves to shatter the glass spheres women are imprisoned in.

The Feminist Art Movement has played a pivotal role in exposing the objectification of women in society. Abortion, rape and pornography have been flashed before the eyes of the public, forcing many to consider these issues.

Some have found this sort of art vulgar and repulsive, often drawing comments such as "But you wouldn't want to hang it in your house" and "Art is supposed to be beautiful. Why show violence and ugliness?"

The beauty of feminist art lays in its brutally raw honesty, not making any attempt to soften the blow or provide a "fig leaf for society."

As Judy Chicago, a pioneer of feminist art, explained when asked about the meaning of her work, "It was a work of art aimed at promoting empowerment, and a monument to those who have struggled for freedom."

If that does not constitute beauty, I don't know what does.

Same planet, same species

Michelle Guarino

Recently, a seminar was held on the UMass campus based on the theories of John Gray, author of Men are From Mars, Women are From Venus. For those unfamiliar with this best-selling author, Gray believes that men and women are radically different in both personality and viewpoint. This, he feels, makes them symbolically from different "planets."

He attributes these supposedly static differences in men and women to the inaccurate theory that our hunting-gathering ancestors were always relegated with the same gender roles, thus genetically determining our behavior now.

Gray makes blatantly generalized statements in his books about the "mighty hunter" who refuses to ask for directions when driving, and the "nurturing mother" who only speaks about her problems to have them actualized rather than to find a solution.

Both these ideas in mind, the advertisement for Gray's UMass seminar used blatantly sexist wording. The ad claimed that at Gray's seminar, men will "discover" new information and romantic tactics, while women will simply "learn."

In addition, the ad stated that the aggressive "mighty hunter" (man) can regain his rightful dominant place when he learns "the importance of romance to create great sex," as well as tactics to "sweep your partner off her feet with the power of listening, the power of doing little things to show her you care... and score big points."

As seen, the word "power" is used twice in the men's portion of the advertisement, and this power is intended to be wielded over one's female partner. Such statements presume that the only reason a man would do kind, romantic things for his wife would be to "score points" and get better sex.

When addressing women in the ad for his seminar, Gray attempts to reinforce subservience by telling them to learn "how to fully appreciate your man, how to accept your man just the way he is and still get more of what you want, and... the importance of sex for creating a lifetime of intimacy and passion."

In other words, women, don't try to change your husband, even if he is a jerk; simply manipulate both yourself and him to fit his needs, and get what you want in the process. Gray seems to particularly enjoy the thought that women don't appreciate their husbands enough. He states in one of his books that when a woman argues with her husband, "she is forgetting how wonderful he is." (Mars and Venus in the Bedroom)

Is Gray implying that if a woman seeks to defend herself from an abusive lout, an argument is her fault because she is just forgetting "how wonderful" he is?

Also, the notion that men always want sex and women must be coerced or coaxed into sex is a gross inaccuracy, which I'm sure many women can attest to.

Gray's advertisement also quoted course participants, in the hopes of luring in desperate attendants. One man reportedly was willing to swallow Gray's sensist propaganda in its entirety: "It was so great to find out that it's not just my wife that's like this."

A female participant stated, "He now makes me so happy and I can understand why he watches sports."

One has to wonder what exactly these people were "taught" in Gray's seminar. Instead of applying common courtesy to a situation, the seminar seems to state that we are victims of our biology and must accept this.

People are people, and although men and women are socialized to behave differently, we have a good deal of common ground in which to communicate. We also have the cognitive ability to contest the prejudice of people such as John Gray.

I think Gray's books and seminars will only lead to further alienation between the genders. They will also make it more difficult for men and women to relate to each other in any way but sexually.

The long walk home

Laurie Faille

Something has caught my attention the few times I have walked home to Southwest from the library at night. I end up walking with another woman. The strange thing is that I never ask her if she wants to walk with me, and she never asks me if I want to walk with her. As a matter of fact, we never speak a word to each other.

It usually starts with me walking outside either right before or right after another woman leaves. I never know these women. As I start walking, said woman either gradually speeds up or slows down so that she is closer to me. She gets closer and closer until she is walking right next to me. Then she changes her pace so that she is actually walking with me.

I'll notice that our paces begin to match. Our strides grow in synch, so it sounds as though we are marching together in perfect time.

We continue this way through campus. It is usually after crossing Massachusetts Avenue that we separate. She usually turns left to whatever building she lives in, and I go straight, to mine. We never look at each other, or say goodbye.

I have been trying to figure out what it means when two women who have never met feel the need to walk home together, never even speaking.

It's apparent to me that these women walk with me because it makes them and me feel safer. However, it's alarming that these women feel so unsafe walking through campus that they would rather walk with a complete stranger. These women have no way of knowing whether or not I am a harmful person — they just single me out because I am female.

This probably happens to me for the lack of security on campus. I often see police patrolling campus streets at night, looking for drunk drivers and such. However, I have never seen any campus security while walking through campus at night.

There are only two emergency phones along the route I take to get home. Should something happen to a woman walking back to Southwest, she might have to run a quarter of a mile to get to the nearest help phone. It's no wonder many women feel nervous walking alone at night.

I don't feel that women shouldn't walk together. In some way, this activity actually creates a sense of community among us.

Yet I wonder why these women try to be so subtle. If they feel safer walking with me because I am a woman, maybe they should stop me as I leave the library, and ask me if I want to walk with them.

There's no need for us to be so silent. If we share a fear of walking through campus alone, and feel more comfortable walking together, we should be able to express this in words without being embarrassed.

The women on this campus have every reason to be nervous. Recent reports of a peeping tom photographing women in the shower, as well as another man entering women's rooms at night, prove that women aren't safe in their own dorms. If women aren't safe in the residence halls, they certainly aren't safe on campus.

Got milk?

Kelly Parent

Are you female? Don't exercise? Do you smoke or drink too much? According to the National Dairy Council, at least 15 million Americans have osteoporosis. The most likely candidates to be afflicted with osteoporosis are people who have one or more of the above characteristics. But the number one trait for those to be afflicted with osteoporosis is being female.

We usually think of osteoporosis sufferers as old, decrepit women who have shrunk a few inches. Why should we worry about it now?

Arlene Thompson, a registered dietician at the UMass Health Center, responds, "Women lay down bone mass until their early 20s. Then during early 20s to mid-30s, we sustain the mass, until age 35 when we start losing it."

This fact alone should encourage you to start thinking about calcium now, so that you aren't trying to play catch- up later in life. Just watching your mother or someone close to you go through menopause should give you a wake-up call to start thinking about what you can do now.

The typical diet of a college student isn't always the most nutritious, especially during those all-night cramming sessions when one downs caffeine to make it through the night.

"So many students substitute milk with Diet Coke," said Thompson. She also emphasized that while there are ways to increase calcium intake, there are ways to interfere with or deplete calcium intake (such as excessive salt in one's diet).

"We need magnesium and Vitamin D to absorb calcium... and you shouldn't take iron supplements with calcium because it inhibits absorption," said Thompson.

What are other ways to aid absorption of calcium? One way which Thompson mentions is weight-bearing activities such as free weights or nautilus, because it increases bone density.

"Vegetarians can drink soymilk, rice milk, collard greens, or tofu to get calcium," she says.

The dietary requirement for calcium is 1200 mg per day for ages 18–24, and 800 mg for those over 24, according to the Nutrition News supplement from University Health Services. That equals about four or five servings a day. Calcium isn't just found in milk, it can be found in yogurt, cheese, milk shakes, ice cream, oranges and cappucino (my personal favorite), to name just a few sources.

If you're very desperate, you can take a calcium supplement, although most of the experts, including the American Dietetic Association, don't recommend it. If you do take a supplement, Thompson gives the following tips:

- Don't take calcium lactate because it can lead to gastrointestinal problems later in life.
- Take calcium carbonate or citrate in liquid or gel form because the absorption rate is high.

Why wait until we start shrinking, especially when this is the most critical time to add bone tissue? Why wait until you reach the magical 30s when you will gain the maximum amount of bone mass you will ever have?

These days, everyone is concerned about the way they look, and they should worry about how they feel as well. The most important thing is to be healthy inside and out. Who believes in growing old gracefully? I'm going to fight it every step of the way.

Fighting athletic discrimination

Michelle Guarino

Freshman biology major Olivia Cabrero is taking a long- awaited step forward for women on campus with her proposition of a coed wrestling team at UMass. Although Cabrero is pursuing the formation of the team for the sole reason that she loves wrestling, she brings to our attention the issue of athletic discrimination, a form of discrimination against women which is not often addressed.

Take a moment to consider the different ways athletic oppression manifests itself, starting with prejudices concerning the capabilities of the female body.

From an early age, women are discouraged against being physically strong and aggressive. Women's athletic facilities tend to be nowhere near as extensive as men's, and women seem to be offered fewer options of sports they can play. Additionally, there are few career options for women who want to play professionally, and even fewer sports scholarships.

The reason behind this discrimination may seem plausible at first, if one doesn't try to deconstruct the myths that surround the differences between the sexes.

Little boys and little girls' bodies are not all that different. So why are boys encouraged to play Little League baseball, while girls are usually forced to play softball? Baseball is hardly a contact sport, but many people voice concern about the potential injuries for girls playing baseball. Ice-skating, gymnastics and horseback riding seem more likely to cause injury, yet young girls are encouraged to participate in these sports as opposed to "rougher" ones.

Could it be that these activities are designated as "feminine," therefore more acceptable? Or that injuring one's back or being bruised up on the ice is somehow more acceptable, less unattractive than a black eye from an errant baseball?

Many argue that the male body is stronger than the female body. However, people don't consider the fact that boys are encouraged from a young age to be strong, large and aggressive. Women, on the other hand, are taught to diet, to be as small and slim as possible, and to exercise only to be toned rather than strong.

If a woman is physically strong, or larger than socially acceptable, she is often rejected by others and led to feel unattractive. This is a form of psychological conditioning which restricts the abilities of a body far more than gender.

People also tend to forget that though males, on average, have more arm and shoulder strength, women usually have stronger hips and legs. It is technique, rather than brute strength or force, which is the primary determinant of one's success in a sport.

There are many natural differences between individuals when it comes to size, strength and aggression, and testosterone levels vary greatly from human to human. Therefore, it is preposterous to assign a specific category of abilities to a single sex.

If you find my viewpoint too radical, consider that just a generation ago, female basketball players were allowed to use only half the court. Bicycling and typewriting were considered activities too strenuous for women at the turn of the century, and doctors in the '20s considered studying to be unhealthy for the reproductive system.

Sports discrimination is blatant sexism, and serves only to reinforce stereotypes of the macho man and helpless, passive woman. Women should be expected to pass the same tests men must pass when entering the military or the workforce, as well as the playing field.

If the female body is recognized for its potential physical power, perhaps less rapes would occur, body images would improve, and women wouldn't feel quite so intimidated in the world.

2nd Annual Women of Color Institute

On April 24–26, the Women of Color Program of the Everywoman's Center will be holding the second annual Women of Color Institute. The WOC Institute is a three-day event designed to facilitate and highlight the academic, artistic and creative abilities of women of color at UMass.

The first institute, held in the Spring of 1997, gave women of color a way of connecting with each other and uncovering support resources and information.

This year's WOC Institute will continue to build on this tradition. Sociology professor Dawn Royster will give Friday night's opening address. The theme of Professor Royster's address is "Sisterhood and Friendship: Moving from the Group to the Individual." In addition, UMass based performers and artists such as Cajena and Boundaries will perform.

Throughout the weekend, numerous workshops, presentations and performances will be held, and well over 75 percent of the presenters will be women from UMass. Many will present original works that reflect their culture and ethnicity through the mediums of dance, poetry, theatrical skills, song and music. Workshops that focus on dance/movement, storytelling and the use and harnessing this creative energy into interactive events, are also scheduled for Saturday morning.

Saturday morning's program will consist information about financial aid, academic policies, internships and study abroad programs. In addition, representatives from academic departments have been invited to share information on their respective departments. The popular workshop "How to Get Into Grad School" will also be repeated.

A round table discussion focusing on the experiences of people, particularly young people of color living in Amherst, will be facilitated by Shemandoah Thus, Human Rights Director for the town of Amherst.

The event is being held and sponsored in collaboration with the Educator/Advocator program, the ALANA Graduate Student Network, the Office of Minority Graduate Recruitment, the New WORLD Theater and the UMass Arts Council.

Any women interested in this unique and refreshing event are welcome. For more information, call 545–1671.

Spring a weak time for movies

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

Springtime, that season of rebirth, is notoriously desolate when it comes to films. Audiences were lucky last year with the re-release of the Star Wars trilogy — and rewarded this year via Grease — but those movies were 20 years old, not original, innovative creations. And the recent slop of new offerings — Mercury Rising, Lost in Space, Species II and My Giant — are testaments to the fact that Hollywood's view of spring is "that time before summer."

Fortunately, a number of independent features are slowly surfacing in art-house theaters around the country, and garnering large amounts of well deserved attention. Neil (The Crying Game) Jordan's The Butcher Boy, based on the novel by Frank McCabe, is a shocking, strange portrait of a young Irish lad currently being widely praised by critics. Another gritty youth film, Niagara, Niagara, explores a woman stricken with Tur[illegible] syndrome, something rarely touched in film. Robin Tunney's performance is flawless, and the road-trip movie, which also stars E.T.'s Henry Thomas, isn't bad either.

With all these startling pieces, it's amazing that the worst films are still making the most money. The juiced-up remake of Lost in Space jousted with Titanic at the box office last weekend and won, raking in $20 million. Aided by a vicious marketing campaign and audience gullibility, Lost in Space nevertheless takes all the fun out of science fiction.

In an interview with Premiere magazine, Space screenwriter Akiva Goldsman said he wanted to make the action flick less campy and more dark. Huh? There's nothing wrong with campiness, if it's done right.

The big test for Species II opening today, will be whether they get the campiness right this time. Apparently, sequels can now be made even if the first movie proved terrible. The original Species was a mixed-up trash bin of entertainment — like The Relic, it took itself entirely too seriously. This time around, there's two aliens, and beloved Natasha Henstridge has more nude scenes, but not much promise for a sense of humor this film could definitely use.

Comedy will instead be offered in Father's Day — oops, My Giant — Billy Crystal's sentimental vehicle with NBA star Gheorghe Mureson portraying the lovable outcast, Max. Crystal loves to instill good friendship/family values into his films. When it works, it's City Slickers. When it doesn't, it's City Slickers II. My Giant looks more like the latter.

Perhaps its a symbol of Hollywood's spring when the new film from Ed Burns, the writer-director-star of The Brothers McMullen, is a dreary, mildly depressing look at twentysomething lives in New England. While McMullen and the so-so She's the One were vicious comedies, No Looking Back is a laid-back drama. It's been getting mixed reviews. Burns has a delicious taste for dialogue but doesn't seem to know how to elicit complete performances, save his own. Critics site the all-too glamorous Lauren Holly as being unable to accomplish the gritty feel her character demands.

Often compared to Woody Allen, Burns is more of a conventionalist. But like Allen, he shoots on the East Coast and is primarily concerned with relationships. No Looking Back concerns the love triangle of Holly, rocker-turned-actor Jon Bon Jovi and Burns. While it may fail to reach the potential Burns is capable of, it still is a refreshing diversion from the spring's overloaded blockbusters.

And speaking of overloaded, we wait, along with Hollywood, till Memorial Day for the opening of Godzilla. Campiness or darkness? If the latter, at-least Titanic will surely still be in theaters. And hey, who knows, Titanic might still be around out next spring, too.

Thanks in part to Jane's Addiction backing out as headliner, Lollapalooza '98 is a no-go.

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

It's been a busy week in the music world. Milli Vanilli's Rob Pilatus committed suicide in a Germany hotel room, Great Woods announced a good chunk of their summer schedule, Lollapalooza was cancelled and Pearl Street has announced it's re-opening.

• It's official. Lollapalooza '98 is a no go. After desperately searching for a headlining act over the past several months to no avail, organizers have cancelled the venerable traveling alt-rock festival because it can't book a strong bill.

Festival founder Perry Farrell's band Jane's Addiction was originally penciled in as headliner, but backed out in January. Organizers then asked Marilyn Manson, Garbage and festival alumni Green Day and Nine Inch Nails to headline, only to be turned down by all of them.

Launched in 1991 as a farewell tour for Jane's Addiction (before their "relapse" last fall), Lollapalooza quickly became one of summertime's most anticipated concert events. Its all-day multi-act blueprint was copied successfully by competing package tours such as John Popper's H.O.R.D.E. Festival, Ozzy Osbourne's heavy metal OzzFest, and Sarah McLachlan's Lilith Fair which eclipsed Lollapalooza as the highest grossing travelling fest last year.

While Lollapalooza is off for this year, the festival isn't necessarily dead. One has to wonder, though, about the once-mighty festival's drawing power after disappointing outings in '96 and '97. Unfortunately, Lollapalooza seems to be a concept whose time has passed.

• Closer to home, Pearl Street is set to re-open after being sold back in February. Judging from the acts booked for May and June, the future looks bright for one of the Valley's few first-rate live music venues. They Might Be Giants play upstairs on May 8 while promising newcomer Alana Davis is downstairs in the club room. Other highlights include a visit from Frank Black on May 10, The Crystal Method on May 14 and the Sugar Hill Gang (with Grandmaster Melle Mel) on May 22. Welcome back, Pearl Street, local rock fans have missed you.

• Cambridge's Fort Apache Studios hosted a listening party last Thursday for the new Dave Matthews Band album, Before These Crowded Streets. Judging from several tracks, the new album promises to whet the appetite of fans with more of same instrumental virtuosity and pleasantly inoffensive songs. A perfect soundtrack for the upcoming summer months, no doubt.

Before These Crowded Streets is at least four singles deep, with the most interesting being "Stay (Wasting Time)" — a tune with a bevy of brassy horns and jazzy percussion. The nest planned single, "Crush," is a meandering eight minutes on the album, but will be pared down to a more manageable length for radio. The running order for the album promises to be interesting as 30-second previews of "new" tracks have been inserted in between Before These Crowded Streets' proper tracks.

DMB's third album hits these crowded streets on April 28, with an appearance on "Late Night with David Letterman" the same night. As always, there are guest spots aplenty on the new album, ranging from Bela Fleck's banjo playing to Tim Reynolds' guitar.

Also, after selling 42,000 tickets for a June 6 date at Foxboro Stadium, several thousand additional tickets are going to be released shortly. No additional dates, however, will be added.

• George Michael was arrested in a Beverly Hills park for having his hand[illegible] in the wrong place. Seems the former lead singer of Wham! was taking a cue from Pee Wee Herman. Now he has the folks at his U.S. label, DreamWorks SKG, beating a retreat.

• Also in legal hot water is Motley Crüe drummer Tommy Lee who now faces the prospect of spending six months in jail after beating up a photographer. Guess he'll have that much more time on his hands to think about his upcoming divorce to Pamela Anderson.

• In other news involving pop stars we once cared about, Milli Vanilli's Rob Pilatus died in a Frankfurt, Germany hotel room after apparently overdosing on a combination of pills and alcohol. After seeing VH-1's "Behind the Music" program on the lip-syncing duo, I thought things were well with the former model. Unfortunately, Pilatus will go down as just another casualty of the music business.

• Being the opening act for the Rolling Stones isn't quite the plum gig many have it made out to be. Just ask Meredith Brooks who was twice booed offstage last week in Buenos Aires, Argentina after fans pelted her with rocks, bottles, tampons, marbles and nails.

• Great Woods has announced several shows including dates for OzzFest (July 7), Spice Girls (July 8), Metallica (July 17, 18), the first-ever tour by Shania Twain (August 18), three nights in Margaritaville with Jimmy Buffett (August 26, 28 & 30). Also booked for the Manfield shed are Stevie Nicks, the Allman Brothers, Pearl Jam (both dates are already sold out), James Taylor, H.O.R.D.E. Fest, and the Smokin' Grooves tour which features Busta Rhymes and Public Enemy.

• Tickets for Pearl Jam's September 13 date at the Meadows Music Theatre in Hartford go on sale tomorrow morning at 10 a.m. through Pro Tix (860-422-0000). All seats are $23 and there's a 4-ticket limit per person. Good luck.

Women's lax to visit St. Joe's tomorrow

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow at 1 p.m. on Finnesey Field in Philadelphia, Pa., the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will try to improve on their 4-3 record as they take on the Hawks of St. Joseph's.

If ancient history is any indicatlon, the Minutewomen will do just that, winning three out of the four times they have played the Hawks, including last year's 11-6 victory at Totman Field. Also, while UMass played to a competitive 6-7 record last season, St. Joe's struggled to a 4-10 mark. Over the course of Hawks coach Denise Liggett's six year tenure at the school, the team has averaged only slightly more than four wins a season.

If recent history has anything to do with it, improving their record might not be such an easy task. The Minutewomen had difficulty against their last two opponents, even though they were victorious in the first of the two — a 15-4 decision over Connecticut last Saturday.

"We certainly should go into this game confident," coach Francesca McClellan said. "I'm not pleased with how we played against UConn, and I'm not pleased with how we played against Dartmouth. We need to start getting back to basics."

In their last game, the Big Green outscored the Minutewomen by a 16-7 count on Wednesday afternoon in a contest that wasn't close in the second half.

"I think we played an okay first half, but I don't think we played well in the second half," McClellan said. "I think we've been holding our own, but we need to tighten up a bit."

Dartmouth scored in the first 12 seconds after halftime, and twice in the first minute. UMass allowed a 9-0 scoring run without getting on the board themselves after pulling to within two goals late in the first half, 7-5.

Against the Huskies, Massachusetts picked apart their opponents, but often looked careless and overconfident. UConn, which was not supposed to come close in that matchup, was tied with the Minutewomen 3-3 early in the game. Mental lapses in the UMass defense were the cause of the Connecticut threat.

Against St. Joseph's, the team cannot take victory for granted.

"The truth of it, we've just finished Dartmouth," McClellan said. "St. Joe's has got some very good skilled players and they've surprised us in the past when we weren't paying attention. We're just looking to be a little more proactive than we were against a team like UConn or a team like Dartmouth."

Haigis Hoopla returns for eighth year

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

By now considered a spring tradition unlike any other at the University of Massachusetts, Haigis Hoopla, Western Massachusetts' largest three-on-three basketball tournament, is set to make its return to campus.

The eighth annual event, sponsored by New Balance, will run April 25–26 and will debut a new feature this year, the Hoopla Hi-Five, which is geared toward offering more entertainment to fans. The five components of the Hi-Five are the men's and women's Legends games, the Slam Dunk contest, the Haigis 2-Ball competition and a Kidsports interactive area.

"In addition to the core of the event, our focus this year was towards offering additional entertainment opportunities for spectators and participants alike," Hi-Five director Jon Kinloch said in a press release.

Two of those prime entertainment events will be the men's and women's Legends games. The men's game, which will feature senior Tyrone Weeks, is in its second year, while the women's event will be the first ever.

Former Minuteman players Rigo Nunez and Ted Correll are both scheduled to appear in the men's game on April 25. Former Minutewoman standouts and current professional players Melissa Gurtle and Octavia Thomas will highlight the women's game that same day. Also on the slate for the women are Beth Kuzmeski, Sabriya Mitchell, Crystal Carroll, Kara Tudman, Nicole Carter and Tricia Hopson.

The Hi-Five 2-Ball competition will be run similar to the event of the same name that highlighted the NBA All-Star weekend.

The UMass weekend tournament will feature an assortment of other fan-interest showcases, including a high school all-star exhibition and a women's basketball clinic with UMass coach Joann O'Brien.

For players, Haigis Hoopla offers a variety of age-groups and skill levels, from Couch Potato to Weekend Warrior to Top Gun.

Haigis Hoopla is a non-profit event put on by a UMass sport-event management class. The entire weekend is planned and run by the students, with supervision from professors Dr. Jay Gladden and Dr. Carol Barr. Proceeds from Haigis Hoopla benefit the Erik K. Kjeldsen Scholarship Fund, which awards gifts to undergraduate sports management students.

For more information about this year's event, including registration information, call the Haigis Hoopla Hotline at (413) 545-5689 or visit the event's web page at www.umass.edu/spimg/haigis.

return this weekend from an eye injury that kept her out of the last five games.

UMass will be heading into three weekends of championship play after the Harvard game. How important is this game?

"This game is a steppingstone to our championship play," said McOsker.

The issue heading into tomorrow's contest is whether or not all the preparation has left coach McOsker and the Minutewomen in the position they wanted to be in heading into their championship run?

"We set ourselves up for the championships. All we need to do is keep the intensity and consistency level up and we should do fine," said McOsker.

The No. 6 Minutewomen are poised to make their run at the Championships and it all starts here at tomorrow at Boyden Pool with one of their biggest east coast rivals.

Connecticut in a doubleheader. Senior Liz Wagner pitched her first career perfect game. In the first game sophomore pitcher Danielle Henderson had set the stage for Wagner, pitching a no-hitter. In the second game Henderson also earned her first career hit doing pinch-hit duty. The doubleheader turned out to be even more phenomenal for UMass as the Lady Blue Devils never even managed to get the ball out of the infield.

Henderson has been putting together another great season so far. She has not yielded an earned run in her last 91.1 innings and has also earned double-digit strikeout totals in her last 12 starts. Henderson currently has 202 strikeouts on the season and was honored last week as A-10 Pitcher of the week and WHMP/UMass Athlete of the Week.

"They did not come ready to play," Stone said. "They [Central CT.] had a good pitcher and we didn't wake up until the fifth inning.

"We had one error in the first and after that, things just went south."

In the bottom of the first, the Blue Devils scored four runs off two hits. They tacked on two more in the second and third. UMass ripped 11 hits but they could not score until the seventh inning. The Minutemen added one more run in the eighth inning but it proved to not be enough.

On Monday, the Minutemen return to Earl E. Lorden Field to face Hartford at 3 p.m.

the record we finished with last year," LaFreniere said.

Michelle Cooper made a great comeback after getting injured by weight lifting. Cooper began training again in the middle of the indoor season but was no where close to where she wanted to be. Cooper worked hard and never gave up. She could not break 60 seconds in indoor, but this past weekend she ran a 58.68 in the 400-meter dash, placing fifth.

Shelanda Irish finished seventh in the 100-meter dash with a time of 12.5. Irish is a very versatile athlete and also competes in the long jump in addition to anchoring the 4x100 and 4x400m relay. Irish is also the reigning ECAC champion in the long jump.

The Minutewomen also competing included hurdlers Anja Forest, Rosemarie Bryan, Chrystal Murphy and Andrea Comeau. All of the women participated in the 100-meter hurldles and placed. Forest received second (14.38). Bryan third (14.47), Murphy fourth (14.70) and Comeau received fifth (14.95).

The UMass distance squad had three women placing in the 3,000-meter run. Christy Martin received a third place with a time of 10:31.00. Teammate Melissa Henderson followed her with a time of 10:40.16, good for fourth, while Sharon Tillotson finished at sixth in 11:00.14.

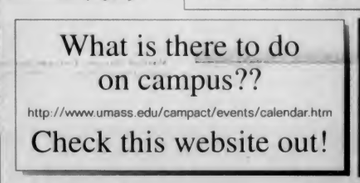
Also in the distance events were Sarah Hirsch and Tracy Meagher who came through for third and fifth respectively in the 5000m. Hirsch ran a personal best 18.02.25 as this was her first time running the event on the track. Meagher ran a 18:07.45, not too far behind her teammate.

UMass also placed in the 400-meter relay. The team consisted of Rosemarie Bryan, who led off for the squad, giving Anja Forest a flawless hand-off of the baton. Forest then managed to hand off to Rachel Shelton despite twisting her ankle. Shelton then set-up Shalanda Irish for the anchor leg to give the team a 48.71 mark.

"The hand-off between Shelton and Irish needs to be worked on," LaFreniere said. "I know that it will take no time to fix. Timing is everything and I know that we will get quicker in this event.

The Minutewomen knew that the competition would be difficult and challenging but welcomed refreshing chance to get out of the New England area and face new teams.

"It made the meet more exciting for the girls to face new competition," LaFreniere said. "It will help us to become a better team. The girls are behind these schools with starting their season. We are a track meet behind, however the women showed promising performances."



Minutewomen Notes:

UMass will hit the road again as they visit Northenstern for a 12 p.m. meet with Boston College, Brown and Southern Connecticut.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Take care you don't say the wrong thing at the wrong time today. Offer information when required; hold your tongue otherwise.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Some may be entertained by your antics today, but others may feel that you are acting inappropriately. You needn't cut loose quite so much!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Environmental influences are too much to ignore today. You are going to have to adjust your schedule and activities accordingly.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Travel plans? You had better be prepared to follow and alternate route, as the one you had laid out for yourself is fraught with pitfalls.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may want to be more aggressive in your approach today. There are those who may be rubbed the wrong way, but overall, you should be successful.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You can capitalize on a sudden, unexpected development today, but you must be ready and willing to act immediately. Delays render you powerless.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — It shouldn't take long for you to make your mark today. Once others are looking in your direction, you can slow down and make a show of your work.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may be tempted to pursue something dangerous today, but with the subtle assistance of a close friend all should turn out well.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Your head and your heart may not be working together today. See if you can't reconcile what you are thinking with how you are feeling.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may not be able to resist doing something that you know will be considered wrong by some of the people around you. Hold your course.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — Speed must not be allowed to put quality of work in jeopardy today. If you must, slow down and make sure that everything is being done right.

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — You may find that you're in control of something that you don't understand. You must be willing to ask for assistance when the time is right.

Men's lacrosse to face No. 5 Loyola

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

JOANNA KANIAPENY / COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will do battle with the No. 5 Loyola Greyhounds tomorrow at 4 p.m. at John Hopkins University.

Fifteen Blue Devil goals made the No. 5 Massachusetts men's lacrosse practice a bit more focused this week in preparation for the No. 5 Loyola Greyhounds. Coach Greg Cannella knows that last week's 15–4 loss is in the books and the team is ready to go for whom he considers "one of the hottest teams in the country, probably right behind [No. 1] Maryland."

The Minuteman defense has dropped two spots nationally for goals against and now will be tested once again versus a Greyhound team that notched 18 scores against then–No. 2 Syracuse. Loyola has slowly regained their confidence in stride with regaining their superstars. Five Greyhound players were suspended earlier in the year for plagiarism violations. The meeting in the Carrier Dome versus the Orangemen marked the first time those players were on the field all at once. Loyola's only loss came to the hands of North Carolina, where they played without three key players, including All–America candidate Mark Frye.

UMass (6–1) will look to capture their first victory over the Greyhounds in the school's history. Since 1963, Loyola has won all five contests, including last year's 11–8 decision over the Minutemen in Amherst. No returnees this year registered a point in last year's outing.

The Minutemen make their first visit to Johns Hopkins University's Homewood Field in Baltimore since the 1989 NCAA Quarterfinals. There they were defeated by the Blue Jays 9–4. Tomorrow's game is part of a doubleheader, with Maryland and JHU rounding out the night.

The Minutemen will look to get some offensive punch that was lacking in the Duke game. UMass had trouble getting in close to Blue Devil goaltender Craig Seyffer, scorting only one goal inside the restricting zone.

"Any time you lose a game like that, it forces you to step back and refocus," Cannella said. "It humbles you, squashing a lot of the egos."

After averaging 14 goals per game in the first four games of the year, the UMass offense has sputtered in the last three, averaging under nine goals. Sophomore Mike Janowicz, seemingly coming out of nowhere this season, registered 15 goals in the first four, but has since then scored only three.

The defense remains a staple for the Minutemen. Goalie John Kasselakis will try to rebound from his poor performance against Duke to shut down the potent Loyola offense led by Frye and junior attacks Gewas Schindler and Tim O'Shea. Kasselakis' 5.92 ranks second in the nation in goals–against average, while the defense ranks third in that category. The defense will try to limit the Loyola shots, especially from in close on Kasselakis. Schindler led last year's 10–4 squad with 39 goals and 26 assists.

"The most glaring asset of Loyola is their team speed," Cannella said. "Their team speed is possibly the best in the nation. Also, their stick skills are amazing. They have a lot of weapons to work with."

The schedule gets a little easier following tomorrow afternoon's contest. A win would give the Minutemen momentum going into Wednesday's home clash with Harvard in the first night game ever on the newly–turfed Garber Field.

Harvard to visit water polo for tournament

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The 20–3 Massachusetts women's water polo team comes home this weekend for their last preparation for the New England and Eastern Championships which will take place during the next two weekends. UMass makes their only stop at home this year when they meet Harvard University tomorrow at 3 p.m. at Boyden Pool. The Minutewomen easily defeated Harvard in their last match in Cambridge. UMass won 10–1.

Scoring contributions came in the last game from All– American Katie Grogan who scored five goals, while Marcie Hupp netted four and Sarah Newell tallied one.

"Recently in practice we have been working on drills and to keep our game awareness and intensity level high, which I feel will make for an even better effort this time against Harvard," Grogan said.

The defense shined through, as it has all season and the total team effort resulted in only one goal allowed. Goalie Peggy Nieves was a big part of the defensive effort, making seven saves. For UMass, Harvard will be its last tune up heading into the Eastern and National Championships.

"Ultimately our goal is Easterns and Nationals, and we know that's where we want to be, and If we play hard and execute Dan's plan then we should be alright," said Grogan.

The Crimson's game presents a big challenge for the Minutewomen. It will be the first time they will be playing in a smaller pool this season, and there is no room for even the slightest error.

"We will not have room to make little mistakes and get away with it like you can in a small pool," said Coach Dan McOsker.

This contest provides a few last moments for some UMass players. The seniors will be playing their last home match. Seniors include goalie Peggy Nieves, Andrea Vazquez, Maria Velazquez and Barbara Hickey.

All these players have contributed in various ways to the team's success and that should continue against Harvard this weekend. Nieves has contributed all season with solid play in net and has even netted a goal. Hickey has been a threat to explode on offense on any given day, while Velazquez and Vazquez have been emotional leaders of the team as well as consistent goal scorers. Vazquez has also been a big part of running the offense when she is at the two meter set.

The team is looking forward to having Vazquez back, as she will

The Massachusetts softball team will return to their usual rigorous schedule this weekend when they play two doubleheaders. Tomorrow the Minutewomen will face off with Atlantic–10 foe Rhode Island at 12 p.m. and on Sunday will play North Carolina, also at noon.

UMass last played the Rams in April of last year, winning both games of the doubleheader. UMass is 47–12 all time against Rhode Island. The Rams are coming off of a doubleheader with Boston College, in which they lost both games. The Rams made six errors in the first game and could only connect on five hits in suffering a 9–0 defeat. Rhode Island improved their defense in the nightcap but still ended up on the losing side, 3–1. With the loss, the Rams now stand at 17–17.

Senior Kellie Cookus (Pittston, Pa.) leads the Rams in hitting with a .480 batting average. She has started in all 32 games and leads the team in all major offensive categories. She has 46 hits including five doubles, six triples, five home runs and 21 RBI. She also has a slugging percentage of .814. She was named the Atlantic–10 Player of the Week this week for the period ending April 6. In eight games she went 10–22 (.455) with 10 hits (one double and three triples) and also had four RBI. She also scored five runs, stole four bases, was walked six times and struck out just once. Cookus was also named the 1997 Atlantic–10 Player of the year, leading the nation in doubles last season with 25. She was also an all–conference selection at second base and an ECAC Division I and All Northeast Region First–Team selection.

Starting pitcher and co–captain Kathy Bailey, a senior out of Portland, Maine, has a record of 7–8 and an ERA of 1.79 in 86 innings of work. Bailey has made a dramatic recovery this season, returning after rupturing her Achilles tendon last December.

The Minutewomen have not played North Carolina in a full 10 years, with their last game dating back to 1988, a UMass win. The Minutewomen and the Tar Heels have only faced off a total of three times, with UNC holding the edge at 2–1.

The Minutewomen last played on Tuesday, shutting out Central

Baseball to compete in weekend series

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Snapping a four–game winning streak, the Massachusetts baseball team hopes to hop back on the fast–track during their two–game series with Temple today and tomorrow. On Wednesday they fell to Central Connecticut, 9–4.

Temple is in the midst of an up–and–down season in which their longest winning streak is three games. On Wednesday they lost to Villanova 8–12 to fall to 11–17, 3–3 in the Atlantic 10. Collectively, they bat .291 with Bob Filler leading the team at .356. Filler has recorded two home runs while driving in 18 runs on 36 hits. Five other Owl players hit over .300 including Craig Munroe who has been providing the power for the team with five dingers while knocking in a team–high 27 RBI.

The Minutemen have excelled at the plate, averaging an impressive .338 average. Senior Muchie Dagliere tops the charts, hitting .470 with 31 RBI on 39 hits. The second baseman is currently riding a 20–game hitting streak. Rightfielder Pete Gautreau has also experienced some success at the plate, batting .397 with three triples and four homeruns. Captain Doug Clark is slugging a monstrous .721 with 6 homeruns.

While the hitting and weekend pitching has been a mainstay so far in the season, the weekday pitching has yet to achieve such stability.

"If we have good pitching, then we have a good shot at winning," Coach Mike Stone said.

Junior Bill Cooke will start today's game while Ryan Cameron is slated to be the closer. Tomorrow, Jeff Puleri is set to start with Travis Veracko as the finisher.

Wednesday's loss marked the collegiate starring debut of freshman Craig Szado, who allowed four runs in the first and could not recover after that.

Women's track prepares for championship season

By Jana Benscoter
Collegian Correspondent

This past weekend the Massachusetts women's track and field team faced tough, southern competition in a non–scoring invitational meet. The women returned to competition after a four–week hiatus, geting rid of some of the dust.

For the Minutewomen, there were several strong performances. Senior Shana Mitchell received first place in the hammer throw, reaching a personal record of 154 feet. Mitchell also received sixth place in the discus with another personal record of 134 feet pulling off the super double.

Rebecca Donaghue also received a first place for the Minutewomen, running a 4:38.03 in the 1,500–meter run. This was a respectable time for Donaghue because she sat out the second half of the indoor season due to a calf injury.

Right behind Donaghue was teammate Nicole Way, who finished second in the 1,500–meter run with a time of 4:41:20. Both Donaghue and Way participated in the 800– meter run and placed. Donaghue finished fifth with a time of 2:18:13 and Way finished sixth with a time of 2:19:68. The two women put forth a good effort showed signs of fatigue. If the meet had been a scoring competition, Donaghue and Way would have scored.

UMass coach Julie LaFreniere spoke very highly of the 4x400m relay team of Michelle Cooper (58.9), Andrea Comeau (57.8), Silifa Kenku (56.2) and Shelanda Irish (56.7) who combined to run 3:49.67.

"Last year the women ended the season at 3:48.28 in the relay. The women are starting the season close to

Faculty union reacts to prof's possible dismissal

An unnamed professor from the College of Food and Natural Resources at the University of Massachusetts may be dismissed despite tenure and faculty union complaints.

President of the Massachusetts Society of Professors Jenny Spencer spoke before the faculty senate body at last week's meeting urging the administration to bargain before agreeing to dismiss the faculty member.

"Before preceding further, we would like confirmation that the Administration will bargain with us... nothing so far has struck us in the spirit of good will and cooperation," Spencer said.

Details of the case are not being disclosed, as are all personnel matters pertaining to the reputation of an individual. The reason for the possible dismissal, along with the name of the professor, has still not been made public.

"All we know is that a dean wants to dismiss a faculty member. It's a personnel issue and any personnel issue is not allowed to be made public," University spokesperson Kay Scanlan said.

Professor Joseph Larson, chair of the Faculty Senate Rules Committee, explained that part of the confusion over the dismissal is due to a new procedure drafted to deal with such issues.

"The Dean of Food and Natural Resources has a faculty member that he has recommended for dismissal. What prompted the discussion in the senate and the union is that someone in Whitmore drafted a procedure to lead to a decision on dismissal. It was drafted without knowing that in 1964, University trustees, the administration and the faculty senate all agreed on a formal procedure," Larson said.

This new procedure, drafted several weeks ago, according to Larson, fails to provide basic due process for the faculty member. The faculty union is currently trying to get the situation resolved without a hearing process and has scrapped the newest draft.

"The old [procedure] was never used because it was never needed. From the union's position, first we need to look at current standards and see what other colleges have done in the last 10 years to ensure maximum due process," Spencer said.

Only one tenured professor has ever been fired from UMass, and that occurred under a procedure that was in place before the faculty was unionized.

"I basically think the problem is due to a failure to realize there was a procedure already in place," Larson said.

UMass officials have suspended the hearing against the professor while they consult with their attorneys.

Dean of the College of Food and Natural Resources Robert Helgesen refused to comment when contacted by telephone.

Administrators back comp. sci. professor in research scandal

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

W. Bruce Croft, computer science professor at the University of Massachusetts, has gained strong support from fellow faculty members in response to a Boston Globe article that ran last Tuesday. The article attacked Croft for making large sums of money from a spinoff company that he created.

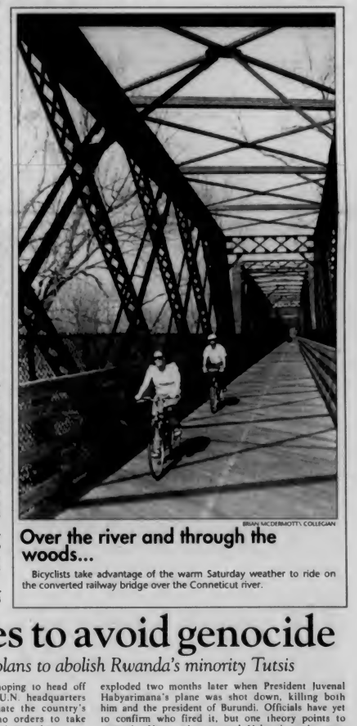
Criticized for using taxpayer's money to create a private company, Croft and fellow UMass researcher James P. Callan co–founded Sovereign Hill Software using a University computer center paid for by taxpayers in what is now called "technology transfer."

The Globe questioned whether these spinoffs "encourage conflicts of interest and allow entrepreneurial researchers to take advantage of taxpayers, using them for no–strings venture capital with little payback."

At last Thursday's Faculty Senate meeting, many senators, as well as Chancellor David K. Scott, addressed the body in defense of Croft.

"I have a feeling that the people who work at this institution will continue to do important duties," Scott said.

Vice Chancellor of Research Frederick Byron also spoke in Croft's defense.



"Professor Croft has played by the rules... he should be commended," Byron said.

Currently, UMass owns 5 percent of Sovereign Hill and earns no royalties from the company. Croft receives royalties and $1000–a–day consulting fees on top of his $117,000 yearly salary.

At the time of Sovereign Hill's inception, Croft and Callan insist that there was no University policy governing technology transfer of software and they were therefore were left on their own.

According to the Globe, Croft and Callan control shares and options in

Mexicans arrest 12 for rebel sympathies

SAN CRISTOBAL DE LAS CASAS, Mexico (AP) —Authorities escorted 12 foreigners– including three Americans — to Mexico City yesterday, a day after they were arrested in a raid on a southern Mexican town sympathetic to area rebels.

At the airport in the Chiapas state capital of Tuxtla Gutierrez, police transporting the prisoners used the butts of their rifles to beat two news photographers taking pictures of the departure. Associated Press photographer Pascual Gorriz Marcos, 27, of Spain, suffered a gash to the head, and Agence France Presse photographer Oriana Gonzalez Elicabe, 25, of Argentina, was bruised.

Both left with their film and equipment, which Gorriz Marcos said authorities had tried to confiscate.

Dario Chacon Montejo, watch commander on duty at the Chiapas State Public Security Police in the state capital, said he had no information about the airport incident, but would investigate. The foreigners were arrested Saturday when 750 Mexican police and soldiers raided Tanperlas, near the Guatemalan border and about 100 miles east of San Cristobal del Las Casas. Initial reports said 11 were arrested, but immigration authorities later said it was 12.

Church destroyed; faithful stand strong

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (AP) —The pulpit of the Open Door Baptist Church lay shattered amid rubble during the Easter sunrise service yesterday, destroyed along with the rest of the building by a monster tornado.

But hundreds of worshippers who gathered in the church's debris–strewn parking lot only four days after the deadly storm still heard a message of rebirth, love and healing.

There were tears and hugs in the predawn chill. There was also laughter — something pastor Rick Cooper made sure of by telling a couple of jokes about the destruction.

"There's a time to cry," said Cooper, standing on the remains of a concrete wall and before a wooden cross hung from an exposed steel girder. "But let me tell you: Life is important."

Sixty–nine people huddled inside a central hallway as the Open Door church was demolished Wednesday night by a tornado with winds exceeding 260 mph. Everyone walked out alive, with the most seriously injured being 11–year–old Janna Presley, whose badly cut right arm needed 80 stitches.

"I'm doing better," the girl said shyly, a Mickey Mouse jacket over the big sling that cradled her arm.

"It's a blessing and a miracle God was with them," said Janie Morgan, who attends the church in suburban Birmingham.

Puerto Rico debates statehood

ISAIAH WILNER
Yale Daily News

(U-WIRE) M AYAGUEZ, P.R. — Sheets of rain bounced off the curb outside "La Cacerola de Maria," a tidy cafe just off the Plaza de Colon in Puerto Rico's third largest city.

"¡Salte!" joked Maroa del Carmen Zapata, the owner, stretching to her full 5–foot–3 and pretending to point an inebriated man to the exit. After four Medalla beers, the gray–haired gentleman in a faded cotton shirt had begun to stutter for statehood. He did not want to leave, he said, because then he could not eat fried snacks and talk to people from Connecticut and shake their hands. Zapata smiled and told him he could stay.

Beneath the smiles are serious differences of opinion. On Mar. 4, the U.S. House of Representatives voted 209–208 for the possible introduction of the commonwealth of Puerto Rico as a full–fledged state. Now, other U.S. citizens are beginning to notice Puerto Rico.

But on the island, sentiment remains split. Puerto Ricans have debated the issue since 1952, when the island first gained commonwealth status. In 1998, the commonwealth elected a pro–statehood governor, Pedro Rossello MED '70, with 51 percent of the vote. In a non–binding 1993 vote, 48.6 percent voted to keep commonwealth status, 46.3 percent voted for statehood, and 4.4 percent wanted independence, according to the Boston Globe.

Around the island, many members of the professional class said they believe statehood could invigorate Puerto Rico's economy. But among the 50 percent of Puerto Ricans who live below the federal poverty line, worries persist that statehood could result in the loss of Puerto Ricans' distinctive culture. Erazmo and Leoncio Quitones, two brothers from Culebra, an island off the eastern coast of Puerto Rico, lived and worked in New York City during the 1960s, until they got fed up with the cold and returned home. Now, they said, they want fast–paced economic change, but they worry they could lose their language.

"Most people want to be another star on the American flag," Erazmo Quitones said. "We gonna get a lotta factories, industry. We work ... and then we can pay the taxes very easily."

Boston NAACP rips mag's Gates headline

By M. DOUGLAS O'MALLEY
Harvard Crimson

(U-WIRE) ROXBURY — The Boston chapter of the NAACP held a press conference yesterday at the People's Baptist Church, stirring the current controversy over Boston Magazine's headline, "Head Negro In Charge," in its April profile of Henry Louis Gates, Jr., W.E.B. DuBois professor of the humanities.

Leonard C. Alkins, president of the Boston NAACP, joined with presidents of surrounding branches — along with Reverend Charles R. Stith, national president of the Organization for a New Equality and Dr. Joan Wallace-Benjamin, president of the Eastern Massachusetts Urban League — in demanding that Boston Magazine publicly apologize for the headline.

"In my opinion, neither the city of Boston nor the nation itself possesses the interracial maturity to manage the use of a racial epithet on the cover of a mainstream magazine like Boston Magazine," said Wallace-Benjamin.

"This is an insensitive statement," Alkins said. "Would you ever see Head Caucasian In Charge, Head Cuban In Charge or Head Greek in Charge?"

Boston Magazine editor R. Craig Unger '71, who is a Crimson editor, did not attend the press conference and could not be reached for comment yesterday.

But in a statement released Sunday night, Unger defended his headline on the grounds that the term is accepted throughout the black community.

"It is a term that has been widely used by black intellectuals and writers, such as Harvard professor Cornel (R.) West ('74), The New York Times' Brent Staples, and Gates himself in his interviews with us," Unger's statement said.

U.N. tries to avoid genocide

Headquarters leaked plans to abolish Rwanda's minority Tutsis

PARIS (AP) — U.N. officers hoping to head off Rwanda's 1994 genocide wrote U.N. headquarters about leaked plans to exterminate the country's minority Tutsis, but received no orders to take action, a French newspaper reported yesterday.

The report that a top Rwandan official disclosed a plan for genocide — and that U.N. officials failed to act on it — came amid a widening French parliamentary investigation into who was to blame for the slaughter that left at least 500,000 minority Tutsis and moderate Hutus dead.

The article by the Journal de Dimanche included a copy of the fax dated Jan. 11, 1994, which said an unnamed U.N. commander was "put in contact with a very important government politician. Informant is a top–level trainer" in the main Hutu militia. The exiremist militia spearheaded the genocide campaign that began on April 6, 1994, and ended three months later when Tutsi rebels toppled the Hutu government.

The informant, identified only as "Jean-Pierre," spoke to Belgian Col. Luc Marchal and provided pictures of stockpiled arms, hit lists and militia training videos, the newspaper said. The informant said one plan called for the militia to target opposition lawmakers and Belgian soldiers in January, according to the faxed message.

"Deputies were to be assassinated upon entry or exit from parliament," the U.N. fax said. "Belgian troops were to be provoked, and if Belgian soldiers resorted to force, a number of them were to be killed and thus guarantee Belgian withdrawal from Rwanda."

While that mission wasn't carried out, tensions exploded two months later when President Juvenal Habyarimana's plane was shot down, killing both him and the president of Burundi. Officials have yet to confirm who fired it, but one theory points to extremist Hutus who opposed Habyarimana's peace accord with the Tutsis. Marchal immediately passed the information to the commander of U.N. peacekeepers in Rwanda, Gen. Romeo Dallaire, who a day later sent the fax to U.N. headquarters in New York, the Journal de Dimanche said.

Despite the warning, the peacekeeping office headed by Kofi Annan, the current U.N. secretary-general, refused to take action. Annan last month said in an interview with the French daily Liberation that despite ominous reports before the genocide, "the necessary political will to send a force didn't exist."

A French parliamentary panel is to hear several top French ex-officials this month, including prime ministers Alain Juppe and Edouard Balladur.

The investigation was launched last month amid reports the French government allegedly coninued to arm the Huiu-led regime even after the genocide began.

Last week, a Rwanda expert told the panel the rockets that downed Habyarimana's plane came from French stockpiles. The panel promised to look into the allegation.

Meanwhile, Hutu rebels wounded a local official and killed his driver in an attack in central Rwanda that brought this week's death toll to more than 100, Rwanda News Agency reported Sunday. Rebels ambushed the pair as they they drove Saturday through Kivumu, some 15 miles west of Kigali.

Kentucky campus declared dry by fall

By Mat Herron
Kentucky Kernel

(U-WIRE) LEXINGTON, Ky. — Some campus leaders say it was inevitable.

Others say the time was right.

Despite the opinions, University of Kentucky fraternities and sororities will no longer be allowed to have alcohol in their houses beginning next fall.

The University's Board of Trustees approved the new policy Tuesday, after months of discussions with student leaders following the board's resolution in October to re-examine its alcohol policy, as well as the deaths of Benjamin Wynne at Louisiana State University and Scott Kreuger at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology last fall.

"The decision is timely," said Dean of Students David Stockham. "The process started back in the fall, and the intent was to curb the kinds of things that are hurtful to students. For me, the bottom line is students' safety."

Interfraternity Council officials had been hoping for a much longer timespan to adopt the policy, but said they will work with it.

"We had been hoping for the year 2000, which seems to be a trend across the nation, but that's not what we got," said Marc Clegg, vice president for external relations for IFC. "Some of the enforcement response is coming down on IFC. It's a very sudden change and we have to cope with it."

While the decision may have perfect timing on UK's part, some leaders say a dry Greek System was already a done deal, even before the UK board meeting Tuesday, even before the Phi Kappa Psi, Phi Gamma Delta and Sigma Nu social fraternities announced they'd stop in-house drinking by the year 2000, and even before the January symposium most of the fraternities and sororities attended on stopping alcohol abuse.

Former Interfraternity Council President Tony Hayden said he met with Stockham, Assistant Dean of Students Victor Huzard, Chancellor Elisabeth Zinser, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs James Kuder and Dean of Fraternities Tony Blanton in October to talk about a dry Greek System.

"Chancellor Zinser basically said, 'We're going dry' and tried to get input on how the system would adapt," said Hayden, a political science senior and a member of Sigma Nu. "From my view of it they had already decided we were going dry."

Hayden likened implementing a policy this quickly to putting "an animal in a corner."

"If you bring something down that sudden in the first year, you're going to have more violations," he said. "I was for a gradual induction of this system. I knew it was going to come down, I just didn't think it would come down this quickly."

Hayden said he foresees the new policy heaping a lot of pressure on fraternity presidents to straighten out their chapters, but also commended UK for being proactive.

"It will be interesting to see how people will react," he said.

This year Greek systems were already moving in the dry direction because of high liability insurance, repeated violations of risk management policies and an overall need to override the culture of fraternities on campus, leaders say.

"That the symposium was held in January is an indication that things were headed in that direction," said Bill Martin, executive director of Phi Gamma Delta International, who spoke at the symposium. "There were a number of signals that this was something that the Board of Trustees felt was a step that was going to be necessary."

Phi Gamma Delta announced in the beginning of October its new policy to make all of its U.S. and Canadian fraternities dry by the year 2000, setting off a chain reaction among some fraternities across the nation.

Martin called UK's policy "encouraging."

"We believed, when our board of directors made its decision, that we were simply on the front end of a trend among Greek organizations and higher education toward alcohol-free housing as one part of the approach to address problems related with alcohol," Martin said. "It is a big help to us, because it contributes to changing the culture that needs to be changed."

The University targeted the Greek community first because that's where the greatest concentration of underage drinking occurs, Stockham said.

"The preponderance of people in fraternities and sororities are not of legal age," he said.

Of the Boone Faculty Center, which is considered to be the only "wet" area on campus, he said, "I don't think there's a double standard there. Somebody might want to argue that. The faculty club is a licensed establishment."

For a smoother transition, Hayden proposed a neutral venue, like the Boone Faculty Center, where students who were 21 had to present IDs to drink.

"It doesn't even have to be as nice," Hayden said. "Anybody could rent it out."

Nonetheless, friction is expected with a decision like this, said Joel Epstein, attorney at the Higher Education Center for Alcohol and Other Drug Prevention, an organization funded by the U.S. Department of Education in Newton, Mass.

Professor Joseph Larson, chair of the Faculty Senate Rules Committee, felt that the article was unfair and one-sided.

"There seems to be two things not well addressed [in the Globe article]. First, the value of the University's role in creating new industries in the state and jobs that add value to the economy. We've been asked to view the University as an engine to help recover the economy in this state. One way is these spin-offs," Larson said.

"They also didn't look at the value to our graduate education program. There are graduate students whose training comes through working on research projects like that," Larson said.

According to University spokesperson Kay Scanlan, Croft himself brings $2 million to the University through research.

Croft and Callan refused to comment when reached by telephone.

public apology.

"We require and deserve an apology," said Joyce Williams, president of the Newport County Branch of the NAACP. "How hard is it for someone to apologize? We want [him] to say he'll never to do it again."

An attempted meeting on Monday between the magazine's editors and Stith, Aikins and Wallace-Benjamin immediately fell apart when Stith and others objected to the inclusion of black community members who supported the editors, according to Stith.

"We are not interested in a black debate. There is a diversity of ideas [within the black community]. The debate [is between] the Afro-American community and Boston Magazine," said Wallace-Benjamin.

The conflict quickly became a shouting match between Stith and Reverend Eugene Rivers on the sidewalks outside the magazine's offices, a scene played out in front of television cameras.

"It was clear that the intent of Boston Magazine was to try to spin their way out of this controversy rather than to deal with the problem they had created by using a racial slur on the cover of their magazine," Stith said.

Stith said Rivers' support of the magazine is based on monetary influence.

"He is by his own admission on the payroll of the magazine," Stith said. "The only people that defend them on this are the people they are paying."

Several speakers also compared the controversy with two local incidents, the racially motivated Fall River attack and the two teenagers in Amesbury who wrote racial slurs in letters to a teacher.

"When a mainline media outlet like Boston Magazine publishes racial epithets on its cover, it in effect desensitizes and at worst legitimizes the sorts of things that we've seen happen in Amesbury and Fall River," Stith said.

"We want an apology, we want it addressed," Wallace-Benjamin said. "Nobody gave [the editors] a poetic license."

Wallace-Benjamin also refuted Unger's attempts to legitimize the headline because of the use of the phrase in the black community.

Taliban forces kill 5 wound 3 in battle north of capital

By Zaheeruddin Abdullah
Associated Press

QUALI MURAT BEG, Afghanistan — In their first major offensive in months, Taliban forces backed by artillery fire and fighter jets overran four enemy enclaves north of the Afghan capital, senior Taliban officials said yesterday.

Taliban forces launched the attack late Saturday, pounding opposition positions at Guldara, about 15 miles north of Kabul, commander Mullah Hezatullah said.

Artillery and rocket fire continued yesterday, as a stream of Taliban reinforcements headed north to the front lines from Kabul under a warm spring sun.

Hezatullah said the Taliban assault was a preemptive strike against ousted military leader Ahmed Shah Massood who, he said, had deployed fresh troops to attack the capital.

Five enemy soldiers have been killed and three wounded in the fighting, Hezatullah said. His claims could not be independently confirmed. Both sides in the conflict regularly make inflated claims of success.

The Taliban Islamic army dominates 85 percent of Afghanistan and is battling an alliance of northern factions for control of the rest of the country.

The United Nations has urged both sides to negotiate an end to the fighting and has called for an embargo on arms flowing into the country.

The call for talks received a boost Sunday, when Iranian President Mohammad Khatami declared his support for negotiations, the Islamic Republic News Agency reported in Tehran.

But the report gave no indication whether Iran would heed a call by U.N. envoy Lakhdar Brahimi to halt arms deliveries. And in Afghanistan, none of the warring parties appeared willing to abandon their military aims.

■ Puerto Rico

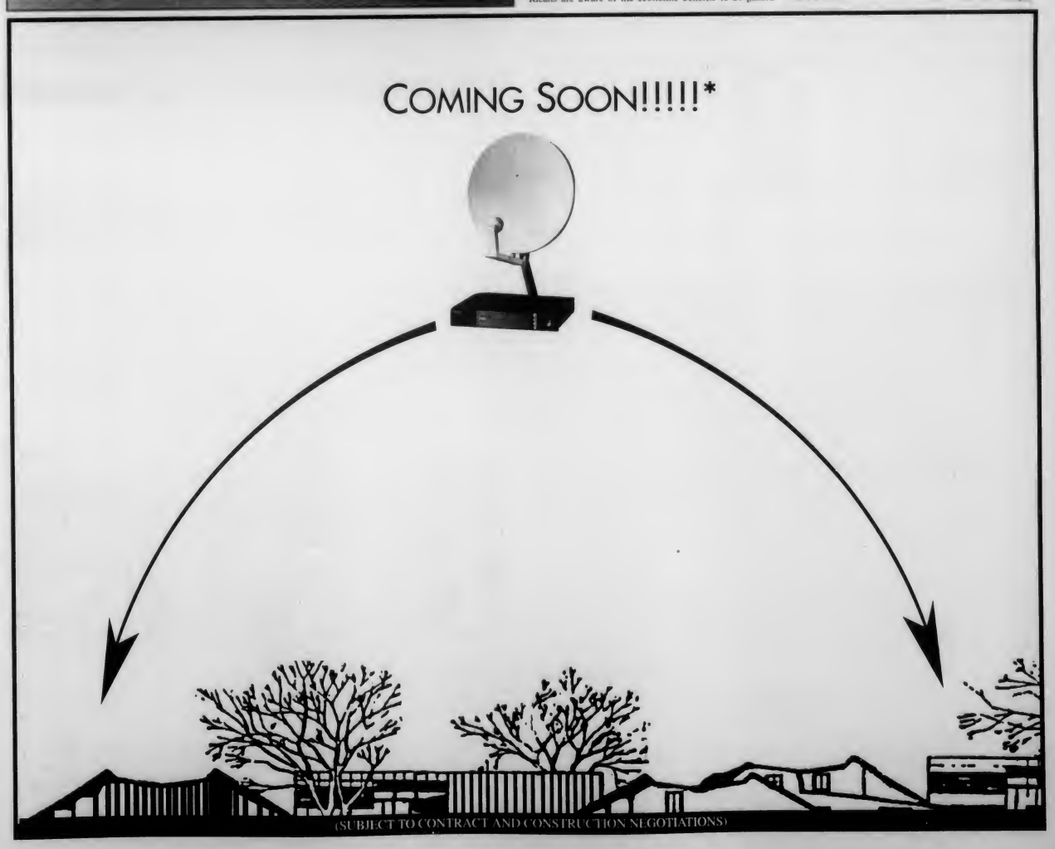
But Puerto Ricans like the Quitones brothers understand the price paid for statehood. Nearly 100 percent of Puerto Ricans speak Spanish. Half speak English, and some fear they could become the American equivalent of Quebec.

"I think that if Puerto Rico became a state, we would lose our culture and our traditions," said Jose Alber Rodriguez, a police officer patrolling the dense avenues of Old San Juan.

One hears a lot about culture and traditions on the island, but no one bothers to define them. Puerto Rican culture, like much of American culture, is hybrid and hard to place. There is no equivalent in Puerto Rico to the salsa, or to santeria.

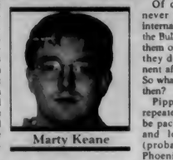


Burger Kings now pockmark the grassland between cities on the island's west coast. And American leeps now march down Isla Verde's luxurious hotel strip on weekend nights. But many blast Spanish music, suggesting that the Americanization of Puerto Rico will lead more to a new definition of what it means to be American than to what it means to be Puerto Rican.

Contrary to many Americans' belief, nearly all Puerto Ricans are aware of the economic benefits to be gained from statehood, not just the most wealthy. Rodriguez, a 22-year old still slightly gangling, said the $100 he receives monthly in health insurance could rise.

Wealthy Puerto Ricans, like Jose Perez, could benefit even more. Perez, a partner at Price Waterhouse and a trustee on the board of the University of Puerto Rico, said he holds a very "corporate" view of statehood. Puerto Rico is an excellent place for Latin American headquarters of U.S. operations, he said, because "'si' in Spanish has 10 different meanings." Continental Americans cannot close Latin American deals like Puerto Ricans can.

The proposition of statehood is one deal Perez would like to close. It "has shackled Puerto Rico for 150 years," he said. "Instead of running towards development, we're basically taking little steps because we cannot move any faster."



But not all Puerto Ricans take the corporate view. It's morning in Mayaguez. Young Puerto Ricans fire up their Thule-topped sportscars and run to the waves. Huh, statehood? They hop out and set their shortboards on the beach of Rincon, ready to wax. It's 6 a.m. They just want a wave.

The ruining of the Bulls

For those of you who believe all is well in the world of the NBA after the Latrell Sprewell tornado went back into the clouds, think again. The finest assemblage of talent ever to play professional basketball, the Chicago Bulls, are a team in turmoil. In fact, this current campaign may well be the last for Scottie Pippen and head coach Phil Jackson with the team. For Michael Jordan, it may be his last season period.

Marty Keane

The reason for all this? Blame a shortsighted owner, Jerry Reinsdorf, and his egotistical sidekick, general manager Jerry Krause, for this embarrassing charade. Consider this analogy: If the Bulls were a rock band, they'd be the Beatles. Assuming Jordan would take John Lennon's role, then logically, Reinsdorf and Krause are Yoko Ono, trying to drive a wedge between a top-notch bloke and his mates. For anyone who even casually follows the NBA, the mere thought of breaking up the Bulls dynasty is criminal. Although fans of every other team in the league (including all of you who worship at the altar of Rick Pitino) may actually have a shot at winning the Larry O'Brien trophy with the Bulls out of the picture, no one can deny the fact that the NBA needs Jordan. Every road game the Bulls play is a sellout, television ratings for NBA games with the Bulls are 50 percent higher than the league average. Economists conservatively estimate his worth to the NBA in $80–100 million range. Per season.

Besides, when Dr. J., Magic and Larry each retired, Jordan was waiting to assume the mantra of league super-duper star. Who's waiting in the wings now? Kobe Bryant? Not yet. Grant Hill? Not quite. Shaquille O'Neal? He's too busy "acting" and "rapping."

Of course you'd never know of the internal strife within the Bulls by watching them on the court as they destroy opponent after opponent. So what exactly gives then?

Pippen has said repeatedly that he'll be packing his bags and leaving town (probably for Phoenix) after this season because of the way management has treated him. Right now though, Pippen's whining should be little more than a minor headache for Bulls fans.

Coach Phil Jackson — he of the highest winning percentage in league history — is due to step aside after this season per the comments made by Krause last June when he signed the zen master for only a one-year extension. Tim Floyd and Roy Williams, both college coaches with no NBA experience, are the leading candidates to replace Jackson. Makes a lot of sense to me.

And then there's Jordan. Throughout this whole fiasco, he's calmly but firmly stated that he has no interest in playing for another coach at this stage in his career. Why should he be forced to anyway? In essence, as Jackson goes, so does Jordan. Save for Jim Brown, it is unprecedented for an athlete on top of his game to just walk away. Well, OK, Jordan did it once, but twice?

The only reason Jordan may be facing such an awful decision is because Reinsdorf and Krause want to "bring in their own people" to coach the team. Translation: They want a someone who can be easily manipulated like a puppet. I can only imagine the two stooges merriment as they yuk it up pulling strings.

The point here is simple. The Bulls are the best team in the NBA. Phil Jackson is the best coach in the NBA. Michael Jordan is not only the best player in the NBA, he's the greatest athlete of our time. For Reinsdorf and Krause to dismantle the NBA's best team, not to mention the league's most marketable resource, is unthinkable. I thought sports were supposed to be run like other buisness, you know, doing what's best for the bottom line. Let's see how many of the United Center's 210 luxury boxes are renewed with Toni Kukoc as the Bulls' marquee player.

"Michael Jordan is not only the best player in the NBA, he's the greatest athlete of our time. For Reinsdorf and Krause to dismantle the NBA's best team, not to mention the league's most marketable resource, is unthinkable."

Quite simply, the Bulls are not only America's team, but the world's team. We, as sports fans, deserve better. Let's hope the two Jerry's, Reinsdorf and Krause, realize this too, before it's too late.

Blame it on the rain

Before I begin, I want to take this opportunity to express my most sincere condolences to the friends and family of Milli-Vanilli's Rob Pilatus. Yo, Rob, together we're one, separated we're two.

Now to the matter at hand.

Anyone out there listen to WAAF? Well, turn off the Guns 'n Roses, put on your cleanest N.W.O. shirt, and join me in expressing another round of condolences for drive-time D.J.'s Opie and Anthony. Actually, I'm more inclined to say "good riddance" to the two faces–made–for–radio, but I digress.

Paul Hayes

If you didn't hear, Opie and Anthony were booted from WAAF following an April Fools Day gag. They told listeners that Boston Mayor Thomas Menino had been killed in a car accident in Jacksonville, Fla. Some listeners, friends and associates of Mayor Menino's apparently bought into the joke hook, line and sinker. In turn they flooded the mayor's office with calls expressing their grief and concern.

Now, one might question how listeners could take the announcement of a high profile death, on April first, by central Massachusetts' two "wackiest" D.J.'s seriously. I myself wonder how they could not have put two and two together. But from a strictly legal point of view, Opie and Anthony were flat out wrong, and their actions are indefensible.

Because their false death report was issued with actual malice, which is to say they knew what they were saying was false, they could be sued for libel because of the gag. Menino could prove that the reports of his death caused actual injury to his friends, family and colleagues. On a personal note, imagine if Pilatus were still alive, how would that make you feel?

Had Opie and Anthony instead said that Menino talked like he had a mouth–full of crap, they could have gotten away with it. I say this because, in the context of a humorous and satirical show such as Opie and Anthony's, it would have been understood to be merely an unflattering joke. See Jerry Falwell versus Larry Flynt for another example.

Adding to the interest of this story is the fact that on April first, other D.J.'s on WAAF also pulled hoaxes on the audience.

According to my brother Ryan, who listens to WAAF while working at some place on the Winchester/Woburn line, morning D.J. Greg "The Hillman" Hill told the audience that an asteroid would be visible as it zoomed overhead at 9:20 a.m. My brother said he and his co–workers actually went outside to look for it. Some of them even pointed in the sky, and claimed to see it.

He also told me that D.J. John "O–Zone" Osterland had said the lead singer of Stabbing Westward killed an unruly fan during the band's show the previous night in Boston. Osterland also said Pearl Jam had broken up.

Now, before you approach my brother and his friends with swampland in Florida, let me note that his stories reveal a lot of people who apparently couldn't put two and two together. And maybe, considering this, one could imagine how distraught one would be if they heard on the air that a loved one or friend had died.

Opie and Anthony could blame the fact that they got screwed on the rain, cause the rain don't mind. But they should probably blame it on the fact that the harm of their prank was foreseeable, while the harm of the other pranks was not.

But to the editors of Boston Magazine, I say– "whatever you do, don't put the blame on you."

In their April edition, Boston ran a story on Harvard University African–American Studies professor Henry Louis Gates Jr., entitled "Head Negro in Charge." The story has received a lot of backlash from some of Boston's black activists.

One of these activists, Reverend Charles Stith, called the headline offensive and demanded an apology. Stith sees "Head Negro in Charge" as a term which was used to describe the "House Negroes" of old Southern Plantation days. The "House Negroes" were black slaves which were favored by their masters, and were more apt to defend these masters than the lower "Field Negroes."

Yet Boston editor Craig Unger, in a story from last Thursday's Boston Globe (April 9), defended his magazine's use of "Head Negro in Charge" by saying the phrase had been recontextualized in modern America.

"[The term is] part of the vernacular of modern writers and intellectuals [denoting] the phenomenon of the white establishments selecting one African–American to speak for the [entire] race," Unger said.

Stith claims the title adds to a climate of racial intolerance. Others cite Boston's pandering to a white, upper–middle class demographic as further evidence of its racial insensitivity.

Yet Columbia University Professor Michael Dyson said the attack by Stith and others is a "squandering of the moral capital of the black movement, deflecting attention from more crucial issues (Boston Globe, April 9)." I'm inclined to agree with Dyson.

Stith comes off as someone who has created a controversy, and is using it as an event with which he can reap media exposure and thus further himself. He is raising himself on the backs of a misguided group, who wrongly read "racism" into an article which deals with the imperfect relations of "race." Talking plainly about race relations does not amount to racism.

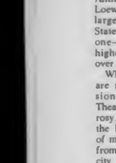
Stith also seems to be ignoring that the title was placed within the context of the article. And in fact Union Baptist Church Reverend Jefferey Brown said in last Thursday's Globe that he himself is referred to as the head Negro in charge.

"I've been called the Head Negro in Charge by people in the black community... it's not a derogatory term, not as it's used now," Brown said.

It seems that while it is not such a bad thing to weed out the irresponsible people such as Opie and Anthony, it is a bad thing to place unnecessary restrictions on responsible journalists such as Unger and his fellow editors at Boston Magazine. We must be willing to allow breathing room for all forms of media, to ensure that free speech can prevail.

I don't think Stith could argue this point. Boston's article was actually meant to heap praise on Gates as an African–American who is in a prominent position to represent his race to many members of the white community.

But in getting back to Pilatus, I once again want to express my condolences to his family and friends. It's a tragedy for me to see the dream is over, and I never will forget the day we met, Rob, I'm 'gonna miss you. I hope you're in heaven giving God a flying chest bump.



And lastly, Fabrice Morvan, if you want to talk call me on the line, call me anytime. Just don't forget my number.

Paul Hayes is a Collegian staff member.

The monster movies

Something stinks in the nation's movie theaters and it's not the day–old bag of popcorn they just sold you for $4.

Currently under review by the Department of Justice Antitrust Division is a proposed merger between Sony Loews and Cineplex Odeon, two of the largest movie exhibitors in the United States. If the deal is approved, the potential one–two theater punch will form the highest grossing movie chain boasting over $1 billion in ticket receipts.

Chris Stamm

While those of us in the Happy Valley are spoiled with $3.50 student admissions down the street at the AMC Theater, life beyond Route Nine is not so rosy. Anyone who has travelled beyond the Holyoke Range knows that the cost of movie admission has rose to anywhere from $7.75 to $8.25, depending on the city.

If this mega–merger is allowed, don't expect things to change.

Since 1980, average ticket prices have increased approximately 71 percent — 9 percent in the last three years alone.

In the 1940s, the Supreme Court found that movie studios were violating antitrust regulations in a case against Paramount Pictures. At the time, the major studios owned the theaters in which their films were exhibited and distributed films through "block booking" — forcing theaters to buy groups of their movies not only the first–run films the paying public wanted to see. However, some trust–busting may be in order today in 1998.

Consider: According to figures sighted in the Jan. 6 Los Angeles Times / Hollywood Reporter Sony Pictures is the nation's market share leader in film distribution dominating 20.3 percent of the market. Universal Pictures, which owns half of Cineplex Odeon, boasts the sixth largest share with 9.9 percent of the market. Do the math and you see this merger would allow the nation's largest movie distributor to be held by the largest and sixth largest movie distributors.

If you leave our little western Massachusetts utopia, you'll find that going to the movies isn't what it used to be.

Over spring break I had the pleasure of trying to take my girlfriend, who just happens to live in the nation's largest movie market — New York City, out for a Friday night flick. Mistake.

We arrived at the theater (a Loews, of course) an hour early to find that the show was sold out. That was nothing. Off to the side of the ticket booth, a swarm of angry theater–goers were irate for being left out In the mid–March Manhattan cold. Apparently, they had shelled out their credit card numbers over a frightening creation called Movie Phone to reserve their seats, which were apparently re–sold to some poor sap who actually sat in line. The fact that Movie Phone causes theaters to sell out hours in advance with show times zipping past lobby ticker–tape screens at a frenetic pace is another matter entirely.

Clearly a consumer–oriented market.

If the merger goes through, the Sony Loews–Cineplex Odeon super–chain would control 70 percent of Manhattan box office receipts and 60 percent of its screens.

In Chicago, the nation's third largest movie market, the merger would dominate 67 percent of the metro–Chicago screens and every screen in downtown Chicago.

Chances are some of you are off to these cities after you graduate and will one day plan on catching a flick after a hard day at the office. We've all heard how choice the job market is for college grads, but really, this merger could be another slap in the face for the good old fashioned date. Twenty bucks for a movie?

The merger is currently being reviewed by the D.O.J. but you never know how long that will take — I think this guy named Bill who does something with computers is turning their heads right now. Have faith. I'm sure that $86 billion Citibank–Travellers merger that was approved last week will level percentage rates and send insurance premiums to an all–time low.

Do something about this problem now — your UMass ID and accompanying student discount is only good for three more years at best. After that it's $8 like the rest of the world.

Ed/Op is looking for new writers!

The Ed/Op desk is currently seeking new columnists. The way to get involved is by submitting pieces for us to consider publishing. They should be 600–800 words long, well–written, and have a point. There are no restrictions on topics, but we are especially interested in pieces on campus politics, satire, and work that takes an unexpected perspective.

Editorials can be submitted by emailing letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu or in person to the Collegian offices in the Campus Center basement. Call Tamar Carroll at 545–1491 for more information.

Protest mandatory GEO fee

To the Editor:

As many of you are aware, the University has recently agreed to a contract with the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO). This contract allows the GEO to claim 2 percent of your income as union dues, or if you choose not to belong to GEO, this same two percent will be mandatorily deducted from your income as an "agency fee." I disagree with the proposition that this "fee" is legal and am initiating a lawsuit against GEO to bar this deduction from my stipend.

If you feel as I do, that this claim by GEO of a proportion of your income is both unfair and illegal, please send me a blank e–mail to swerle@marlin.bio.umass.edu.

Please note that these messages will not be considered as to content, but merely counted in order to gauge support for this lawsuit from the graduate student community. If you disagree with this lawsuit, sending mail to the above address, regardless of content, will produce results counter to your goals.

Comic page needs improvement

To the editor:

There once was a time when I enjoyed reading the Collegian's comics page. It used to be a nice change from the depressing news of campus and the world. That was a while ago. Now, I dread reading the comics page. What was once a humorous respite from the more serious topics of the day has now become a depressing burden. Then, we had Dilbert, Leedee, and University^2, to name a few. Now, the only saving comic of the page is Dilbert, which, although very humorous, cannot save an entire page. It is indeed a sad state of affairs when the made–up lunch/dinner menus are funnier than all of the student comics combined. I can't say strongly enough how tired I am of seeing these crudely drawn figures fill up the comics page with their sad attempts at serious humor.

Sure, it's hard to produce a funny comic strip. I'm not saying that it's easy. All I'm saying is, at least put a small amount of thought into it. If the only thing people say after reading your comic is, "What?" or "I don't get it," then you've done someihing tremendously wrong and need to re–do your comic.

I understand that suffering "artists" need a medium through which to display their work, but please don't make the public suffer in the process. And while we're at it, let's bring back Leedee!

Drinking binge teaches lesson

By Stanely L.P. Sterlin
Collegian Correspondent

Last Friday, a Haitian student had what he called a "near– death" experience from drinking too much liquor in the Southwest Residential Area here at the University of Massachusetts.

The victim was Jeff Desir, a freshman who described the event as an experience he prays will not happen again.

On the night of Good Friday, Desir, a first–time drinker, and his friends decided to drink large amounts of vodka, because they felt bored with their current situation. As Desir calmly put It, "Since we have nothing to do and we are all bored, let's get nice." So as his friends were drinking and playing the Nintendo 64 system, Desir was fumbling in the room in an overly excited manner as this was his first experience at hard drinking.

He explained that, as he watched his friends from a distance having a good time, he felt compelled to consume more alcohol. After finishing the bottle of vodka, he expanded his taste to a cup of Alizé and a 40–ounce of Old English malt liquor. His friends had warned him that it would be a mistake to mix liquor and beer on an empty stomach, but as Desir explained, "I didn't care, I just wanted to see what it would be like to get drunk."

As the evening progressed, Desir, neglecting his friend's wishes, continued drinking the bottle of Old English. At that point of intoxication, he vomited on the floor in his friend's room.

"I was drinking so much, in such a short amount of time, it caused me to vomit on my boy's floor," Desir said.

Before Desir could realize what he was doing was a costly mistake, he decided to sing and bang his head on the concrete wall out of good humor. But when he fell to the ground in his vomit, the fun stopped. In a desperate attempt to preserve his health and assure his safety, his friends had escorted him back to his room in hope that he would feel better with the aid of some rest and time.

His friends then left him alone in his room. He laid in the foul stench of his own vomit and urine, thinking that he wouldn't live to see tomorrow. As he described it, "I had a headache the size of the Prudential rock and my body was aching all over." It then dawned on him to cry to God and call 911 for assistance. The ambulance arrived promptly and took the aspiring student to the Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton where he stayed until the next morning.

From this event, Desir said his attempt to fit in with the "boys" was a "stupid" idea that had no point from start to finish. However, he is grateful for the experience because he now knows what it feels like to lose control of the human body when alcohol is an intoxicating factor.

As for whether or not Desir would drink again, he said, "After what happened, I feel that I got a second chance at life. Therefore, I say no."

It's apparent to Desir that he needs to make an improvement in his life.

African-Americans the target; big tobacco corporations bring destruction to community

Not long ago in a not too distant place, an industry happened upon the perfect product. It was cheap to make. It made users feel good and it was very addictive.

The business world marveled at this discovery and rushed to reap what seemed to be endless profits. Even when it was discovered that the product, when used as directed, would kill its users, the crafty captain of industry fretted not. They would make up for the loss with new markets.

Makani N. Themba

They set their sights on African–Americans, who smoked far less in the 1950s than people in other communities. They began by spreading their money to every cause and institution that African–Americans hold dear.

They funded their music, their art, their concerts, their schools and their churches. They gave money to African–American family reunion groups and sponsored family reunion storytelling contests for children.

African–American streets, buildings and homes bore larger–than–life signs proclaiming the products "benefits."

The industry became so ingrained into community life that few protested when the death toll among African–Americans as a result of this product climbed to more than 50,000 annually.

Unfortunately, this is not science fiction but the real–life story of the tobacco industry's targeting of African–Americans.

Recently released documents show how Big Tobacco plotted to addict African–Americans to high nicotine, menthol–ated cigarettes. These documents demonstrate, in cold–blooded detail, how tobacco industry executives saw African–Americans as a growth market for tobacco industry. Not content to simply market products, the tobacco industry pioneered promotional campaigns that made tobacco a central feature of African–American life.

Few African–American leaders have expressed concern in the face of these business district is virtually vacant after dark. Private security companies are the country's fastest growing enterprises.

Today's street violence and gang murders in the segregated townships are a by–product of a powerful and corrupt, centuries–old system of white rule. The day–to–day violence of interior schools, substandard shelter malnutrition, and poor health care is the root cause of South Africa's crisis of crime. Until and unless millions of black South Africans acquire the basic prerequisites for a decent life, the post–apartheid future will descend into an abyss of deadly violence.

Dr. Manning Marable is professor of history and Director of the Institute for Research in African American Studies at Columbia University.

"Tobacco has caused more death and destruction in the African–American community than illegal drugs, alcohol, AIDS and violence combined."

disclosures. They simply owe Big Tobacco to much.

While most African–American leaders go about their business in silence, President Clinton ponders a limited offer of legal immunity to the tobacco industry in exchange for a cash settlement. The money, according to the Clinton administration, would go to fund child–care policies and other family programs — mostly for the middle class.

These negotiations have virtually ignored the millions of African–Americans living on the front lines of the tobacco wars. Few African–American victims of the tobacco industry can retain high–priced litigators or afford the time and energy of a protracted civil suit. Most are battling for meager insurance benefits — and for their lives.

Tobacco has caused more death and destruction in the African–American community than illegal drugs, alcohol, AIDS and violence combined. Hundreds of thousands of black children suffer from exposure to secondhand smoke in the form of asthma and other respiratory illnesses. A 1993 Center for Disease Control study showed that African– Americans are least likely to be advised by their doctors to quit smoking. According to a University of North Carolina study, up until 10 years ago African–Americans were more likely than any other group to receive medical advise to start smoking for stress and weight management.

Clinton's consideration of tobacco industry immunity in the face of this suffering is ironic, to the least. Under "The Individual Responsibility Act of 1995," he greatly decreased support to communities left to deal with the tobacco industry's impact. Community clinics and hospitals have been shut down. Access to medical care has been limited, and basic financial support for families has been slashed. Any offer of immunity can only increase the burden on communities while letting the industry off the hook.

The newly released documents show the industry's sinister intent to addict African–Americans to the most deadly of its brands. The havoc it has wreaked and the profits It has reaped are too immense to allow it to simply buy its way out. Instead of immunity and settlement, Clinton should tell the tobacco industry to pay its fair share — with no strings attached.

That's the least it can do for the African–American community.

CVSA to host event

By Edgar A. Barros
Collegian Staff

As part of Cape Verdean Awareness Week, the Cape Verdean Student Alliance (CVSA) will hold a discussion at the Malcolm X Cultural Center, which is located in the Southwest Residential Area.

The event will take place this Thursday and is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m.

Three panel speakers are expected to be present at this event. Information on these speakers are not yet being released, except the fact that they are part of the University of Massachusetts faculty.

The discussion which is titled, "We Are More Similar Than We Are Different," will deal with issues such as race, ethnicity, identity, nationality and religion.

"After witnessing the success of the African Student Alliance's discussion on such issues," UMass student and event organizer Joao Amado said, "we were inspired to hold a similar discussion, only we plan on concentrating on, and celebrating our similarities."

Students are looking forward to Thursday in hopes of engaging in lively discussions. "I'm looking forward to the event. It will provide stimulating conversation," sophomore Armindo DeAndrade said.

The belief that people of color share a similar experience has been echoed by students such as sophomore Jose Brandao.

"This discussion will be an essential part of Cape Verdean Awareness Week because we as Cape Verdeans believe that the different ethnic groups are very similar — in a number of ways," Brandao said.

Other students such as freshman Hydn Vales see this event as a coming together of a people torn apart by trivial matters.

"We are all one race if you really think about. The only difference between us are some minor physical features and religion. Once everybody recognizes this, we will be much better off," Vales said.

South Africa after apartheid

Editor's Note: This is part one of a three–part series on South Africa.

Since the election of Nelson Mandela and the end of apartheid's dictatorship, South Africa has been projected as a model of racial reconciliation and peaceful change.

Dr. Manning Marable

President Mandela himself has become his nation's most effective and persuasive salesman, as even the most racist and reactionary Afrikaner former leaders praise his inclusive policies. Almost overnight, the country that once symbolized a citadel of white supremacy, now relishes its new liberal image under the slogan, the "rainbow nation."

From the vantage point of downtown Cape Town, South Africa does look like a modern economic miracle. The business center looks like Baltimore, Seattle, or any other major metropolitan area. The new waterfront mall development has hundreds of exclusive shops and restaurants attracting over 200,000 tourists each year. A new black African professional class has rapidly begun to emerge in both governmental and corporate circles.

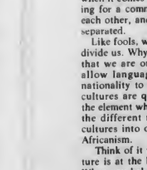
Yet for all the glitter and hype, there remain two vastly different South Africas, separated by an enormous chasm of racial and income inequality. At the top of society are the white upper and middle classes, who for centuries benefited directly from the enslavement and exploitation of the black masses. Whites comprise only 12 percent of the South African population, yet they still own the vast majority of the wealth — factories, banks, land, gold mines, and other resources. Six percent of the population earns more than 40 percent of the total income. The typical white managing director of a company earns a salary that is 100 times that of the lowest paid workers, who are almost always black.

The "other" Cape Town is rarely shown on the tourist maps or guided tours. Outside the city, behind the magnificent Table Mountain, is Cape Flats — a barren, sandy plain that is the home of over one million black and brown people. In segregated, impoverished neighborhoods called Guguletu and Crossroads, Africans live in conditions of unbelievable poverty, hunger, and disease. I saw tens of thousands of shacks constructed largely with cardboard, plastic sheets and wooden boards, without toilets, running water, or electricity.

Poverty's greatest casualties are always children. According to a recent study by South Africa's Human Rights and Gender Equality Commission, about 87 percent of all African children are undernourished, with 38 percent of all poor children suffering from stunted growth. An estimated 200,00 children between the ages of 10 to 14 years are employed in the labor force.

Like Jim Crow's schools in the U.S. southern states a generation ago, the South African system has been a major factor in perpetuating racial inequality. Four years after apartheid was overthrown, six out of 10 schools nationwide still do not have electricity. Student–teacher ratios are often more than 60–to–1 per classroom. Another recent study of South African education noted that 82 percent of all schools have no media equipment such as televisions, computers, or audiocassette recorders, and 72 percent have no library. In many classes, 60 children have to read and learn from only one or two textbooks. Only one black South African in 2,000 attends college or a university, whereas the ratio for South African whites is one in only 30. Because of this educational underdevelopment, it is not surprising that two– thirds of all adult South Africans are functionally illiterate.

Rampant poverty breeds despair and violence. When people don't have anything to lose, they frequently turn against each other. The former apartheid regime understood this well, and it manipulated fear, poverty and old ethnic rivalries to divide and terrorize its non–white opponents. In the 1980s the apartheid government allowed millions of dollars worth of weapons and drugs into the country, saturating black neighborhoods. Even after Mandela's victory, the flow of narcotics and weapons has continued. Between 1994 and 1997, an estimated 200,000 firearms were stolen or lost in South Africa. In 1997 alone, nearly 20,000 convicted criminals were nevertheless granted licenses to own firearms.



As a result, the violence in the townships is nearly out of control, with 100 or more young black men being murdered every week. In the black townships near Cape Town, tens of thousands of black and colored boys, many of whom are 14, 15, and 16 years old, belong to gangs. The level of violence has become more deadly with the introduction of machine guns and other high–powered automatic weapons.

On the first day I was in Cape Tow, the waterfront mall was a scene of a wild gun battle between security guards and two suspected shoplifters. Tourists scrambled to get out of the way of gunfire, and one black security guard was seriously wounded. Violence has now become such a "normal" part of daily life that Cape Town's central

Plight of a people: The return

We need to unite in order to move toward a better future

What is our problem?! Yes, this is strictly directed to all of the black folks in the area. We seem to have extreme difficulties uniting as one. We seem to have extreme misunderstandings when it comes to realizing the fact that we are all striving for a common goal. We hate each other, we envy each other, and we try hard to remain separated.

Edgar A. Barros

Like fools, we allow simple things to divide us. Why can't we all understand that we are one people? Why do we allow language, culture, color and nationality to disband us? All of our cultures are quintessentially African, the element which seems to divide us is the different injections of European cultures into our "mother" culture — Africanism.

Think of it this way — African culture is at the base of all our cultures. When you bake a cake, (I know you're probably thinking, "Where the heck is he going with this?" but bear with me) the two base ingredients are flour and eggs. All of our cultures have that base of flour and eggs — Africanism. Through the course of history we have been divided and different ingredients have been added to the different batches of "egg and flour," but all of our cakes are basically the same; they still contain the base ingredients (eggs and flour).

African–Americans have been injected with American culture, Haitians have been injected with French culture, Jamaicans with British culture, the Virgin Islands with French, Dutch, American, Spanish and British cultures. Cape Verdeans have been injected with Portuguese culture, Dominicans with Spanish culture, Nigerians and Ghanians with British culture, and Mozambicans with Portuguese culture, etc. You get the point.

What we must remember is that each of these injected cultures were forced injections! One of the most effective strategies used when conquering a people, is the forcing of the oppressor's culture and religion onto the oppressed. Thus, the oppressed people (us) come to "love what they hate."

While Europe is working on unifying their continent under one common currency, we are still bickering between each other over childish bullnoggish. While the United States and the rest of his European allies are taking control of the globe, us black people can't even unite under a common thought or purpose.

Below are a few simple examples of what I am talking about.

Our different ethnic groups seem to have trouble actively attending each other's cultural celebrations. I mean, a few might go but will not dance! What's up with that? It's all black music.

Inter–ethnic daiing still seems to be some sort of taboo or a violation of ethnic principals. What's up with that? We are all one people.

How often do you here someone who is not Haitian saying, "Let's go out to a Haitian restaurant," or a non–African–American saying, "Let's go out for some soul food?" Not often. What's up with that? These are all black cuisines. But yet, we will not hesitate to say, "Hey, let's go out to an Italian restaurant," or "Let's go out to a French restaurant."

"Many of us, who shall remain anonymous, believe that the struggle that has been going on in the United States is in no way connected to us and/or does not affect us."

Another element which continues to widen the crevasse between us is the act of separating our histories, and the denial of our history. Many of us, who shall remain anonymous, believe the struggle that has been going on in the United States is in no way connected to us and/or does not affect us. You couldn't be more wrong! You live in the United States, most of us will raise our children in the United States, so the struggle in the United States is very much relevant to all of our lives. The struggle here in the United States by our brothers and sisters is what makes it possible for all of us to be here today.

Likewise, those of us in the United States must not reject or ignore the struggles of our brothers and sisters around the globe. If Nelson Mandela ended Apartheid in South Africa, it was a victory for not only South Africans, but black people around the world. Do you feel me? If Amilcar Cabral freed Cape Verde and Guinea–Bissau from Portuguese colonization and mental slavery, it was not only a victory for West Africa, but a victory for black people everywhere. If Martin Luther King, Jr. freed African–Americans from neo–colonialism, it was a victory not only African–Americans, but a victory for all of us. When Toussaint L'Ouverture freed Haiti from the French threshold, it was a victory for all of us, not just the Haitians themselves. As Martin Luther King, Jr. proclaimed, "Injustice anywhere, is a threat to justice everywhere." It is one struggle.

There are those among us who believe that the whole struggle has nothing to do with them because they were never enslaved or oppressed. You need to wake up to the smell of the wet whip coming across your back! Slavery affected virtually every black person in the world. If you were not physically enslaved, you were mentally enslaved, and if neither of these two apply to you, than your brother or sister suffered from these evil acts. You need to read up on your history, and I don't mean taking an Afro–Am class at UMass.

We need to unite under one common purpose and understanding. I am not asking you to come out to Goodell for a million man march, I am simply stating the fact that we need to unite under one common understanding and purpose. This is not simply a physical unification, it is mental unification.

The sound of what happens when a band becomes huge

Pulp ponders the effects of drugs and pornography on This Is Hardcore.

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

THIS IS HARDCORE
Pulp
Island

About 30 seconds into a mock-gothic tune about drug psychosis entitled "The Fear," Jarvis Cocker drops a not-so- subtle clue that Pulp's follow-up to 1995's Different Class is going down a decidedly different path. "This is the sound of someone luring the plot," he avers gravely, "you're gonna like it, but not a lot."

Indeed, This Is Hardcore is a far cry from the bouncy, synth-spike pop that made Different Class such a rousing success — which isn't necessarily a bad thing, just different. The grandly theatrical stylings have been left in place in all their resplendent glory — just listen to the title track to be reassured. On the flipside, the melodies and hooks aren't as up front this time around. Thankfully, it allows Pulp to explore a broader canvas of musical territory as they utilize droning keyboards and dissonant guitars to achieve the dark mood found on Masters of the Universe.

This Is Hardcore is a Pulp album as you know one only in as much as it's a concept album about life and the inherent weirdness of everything. In short, it's Pulp: The Sequel. It's the panoramic widescreen director's cut of the band through the lyrical pen of Cocker, only without the cheesy cheekiness and pointed commentary on English social classes. This is many things, but Britpop it's not.

It's a work that ponders the question of what happened to Pulp when they woke up one day and found life inside "The Dream" was not quite the overly-romanticized portrayal articulated in their first decade together. Or is it?

Some personality conflicts aside, This Is Hardcore is not an easy work to pin down. The lyrical content is much more assured and personal, without the quintessentially English fluff that watered-down the otherwise excellent Different Class. As mentioned, Cocker seems to want to have it both ways. On one hand, he's the same regular guy he's always been. On the other, he's the suave international playboy, thanks to his newfound fame. It all makes for an interesting dichotomy. Who cares if it makes any sense?

Case in point: On the album's second track, Cocker is a humble homebody who still does the "Dishes." Indeed, he says "I am not Jesus though I have the same initials — I am the man who stays at home and does the dishes." On the next song though, he's that rabble-rouser who mooned Michael Jackson. "Party Hard" is the soundtrack — a bizarre and quite frankly, fairly idiotic "Scary Monsters" homage full of crisp observations like "I've seen you havin it/Havin' it yeah/But now you've just had it," and further:

Deidre Hall signs for two more

"Guiding Light" heats up, Genie Francis to return to "GH" & more

Fans have reason to rejoice this week... one of daytime's reigning queens, Deidre Hall (Marlena) has signed with "Days of Our Lives" for another two years despite earlier rumors to the contrary. Some had speculated that the actress would take a leave of absence to spend a little quality time with her family. "Days," however, apparently made the actress an offer she couldn't refuse.

We can all breathe a collective sigh of relief knowing that Marlena will continue to spread her sanctimonious good will throughout Salem well into the next millennium. I bet you that knife in Laura's back is feeling awfully tender right about now. In my opinion, she's long overdue for a good bitch slap, preferably from the woman whose life she single- handedly ruined, Kristin. Here's hoping she gets what's coming to her before Kristin skips town.

Speaking of "Days," last Friday brought about the big "Killing Pool" revelation. We found out that the Kristin look alike, the one keeled over in the pool, was yet another Bank's spawn (bringing the total to four). Penelope and that the killer was none other than... Edmund or at least we think. How's that for a curve. Most fans had Celeste pegged as the killer, à la her little bout with "Jungle Madness." I mean, generally, that's how most of these murder mysteries play out. It's almost always an evil twin (seems to be the trend nowadays), some random nobody or someone who's lost their mind. Celeste falls into at least two of those categories, wouldn't you say? Next week looks pretty promising too. Look for Kristin to run into Susan on Friday as she makes her getaway.

Fans are not at all amused with "Another World's" decision to let Charles Keating (Carl) go. Ever since word leaked out early last week about him getting the boot, disgruntled fans have been flooding the soap with calls, e-mails, you name it. It'll be interesting to see how this drama unfolds and whether or not "AW" can weather the storm. I don't know what's going on backstage but I smell a rat. Despite the behind the scenes mess, the show itself is as strong as ever. Head writer, Richard Culliton, should be commended for the bang-up job he's done with the show since his debut. His delivery could use some work but at least he's got the show on a roll again after two or so years of stagnant writing.

In a little bit of exciting "General Hospital" news, rumor has it that Genie Francis (Laura) may be making her way back to the soap as early as May, just in time for sweeps week. Please let it be true. There's been such a void, not only in my heart but in the show, since she split town two long years ago. I mean let's face it, she is the Cassadine-Spencer feud and she's long overdue for a reappearance, especially now that she's in the thick of two prominent story lines. If the news is true, expect the Cassadine-Spencer feud to erupt into an all out war, that's if Stefan and Luke don't kill each other on Monday's episode. Bob Guza's made no secret that he's not above breaking up one of daytime's most legendary couples.

Soaps to watch this week:

• "Guiding Light": Carl, Beth's abusive ex, winds up dead this week and almost everyone in town is a suspect, especially Beth. "GL" has had one hot triangle with Beth, Phillip and Harley and now they're throwing a murder mystery into the mix... ah, I love it. For those of you who tuned out after the clone fiasco, I'd suggest tuning back in for a few weeks. "GL" is as exciting as ever and you know what, the worst of the Reva 2 story is over so give the "Light" another shot.

• "One Life To Live": Last week, Dorian found herself on the other end of a bullet during a heist in downtown Llanview. This week, she finds herself at death's door, literally. The show is having her take a stroll into hell with none other than the devil himself, Carlo Hesser, as her tour guide. I can't wait to see the two of them mix it up. Let's see if the Queen of mean can talk her way out of this one. If you're looking for a bit of levity this week, this is the week to watch.

• "All My Children": Jim finally gets what's he deserves, a one way ticket back to hell. The question isn't who had a motive, it's who didn't. Edmund and Dimitri fight for their lives and Erica has a run in with her past.

Sink or Swim:
Sink.

• Michelle and Jesse's romance on "GL." Ugh, these two make me want to vomit. She's always whining and he's just this sappy "Romeo." I haven't seen a more embarrassing couple since Nik and Sarah on "GH."

• Nick and Sharon on "Young and the Restless." What are they doing to my fave couple? I can't believe Sharon hasn't told Nick the truth yet. Forget what Grace has to say, Nick has a right to know that he's got a step-daughter floating around town. Nick needs to stop acting like a spoiled brat too it's so unbecoming.

Swim:

• The reading of Michael's will on "AW." His final goodbye was touching and heart-wrenching (I miss him already), especially his final message to Vicky and Jake. You could just see Vicky's heart breaking when Michael told the two of them to hold on to one another and not let petty differences get in the way of their romance. What made the whole thing so bitter sweet was what happened immediately following the reading of the will, however, when Jake swallowed his pride and gave a clearly distraught Vicky a hug. It brought a tear to my eye.

Jacob Fanning's Soap Chat

• Penelope on "Days." She's such a riot with her witty one-liners. Picture Kristin and Kate all rolled into one and there's your profile. If only they had brought this gem to Salem a few months ago. Eileen Davidson looked like she had a ball with the role too.

• Gillian and Ryan steamy love scene on "All My Children." People are always screaming that there's too much sex on daytime (too much sex... what an absurd concept) but lately there hasn't been nearly enough. Couples making love has been cut to lip locking and then, just when things start to ignite, they cut to a commercial. Next thing you know, the two of them are lying in bed under the sheets. Where's the lust, the passion, the shameless skin shots (á la "Melrose Place")? Last week it was on "AMC." Let the games begin.

more "Why do we have to kill ourselves just to prove we're alive?"

"This Is Hardcore" is Pulp's attempt at "Bitter Sweet Symphony." Kind of. An operatic opus built around a sampled horn loop, the title track is a staggeringly bleak refrain; an ode to a pornographic fantasy as a metaphor for fatal fame. Not many can pull such a trick, but Cocker does it brilliantly.

The answer to all this weirdness of "The Dream" comes on "The Day After The Revolution" where Cocker tells of finding the answer. "Why did it seem so difficult to realize the simple truth," he's decided, "the revolution begins and ends with you."

It would be wise not to underestimate the wisdom and spirit of Jarvis Cocker. After all, it took him a dozen years to realize "The Dream." He knows, perhaps more than anything, about "The Answer." B+

Artist requests bras for tapestry

By Sarah Baker
Daily Nebraskan

LINCOLN, Neb. (U-Wire) — Take off your bra and send it to the president.

Hey, it's for a good cause.

The National Bra Tapestry, a 40-foot wide by 100-foot tall tapestry made of bras that creates an image of the Statue of Liberty is one man's way of attempting to advance breast cancer research.

Nicolino, the conceptual artist and art director for the project, said he hopes to gather 40,000 bras for the project.

"The bras are symbolic," Nicolino said. "They are a political request by women all across the country to get Clinton to do more breast cancer prevention research."

The tapestry is slated to travel throughout the United States and end up in Washington, D.C., where it will then be presented to President Clinton in the hopes to advance breast cancer awareness and research.

Nicolino said the basic design of the tapestry will consist of an outline of the Statue of Liberty, made out of colored bras, and the rest of the picture will be filled in with the remaining white bras. The torch is a special attraction.

"We are hoping to collect 'celebrity bras' to make up the torch on the tapestry," Nicolino said. "So far we don't have any, but we plan to contact Madonna, Sharon Stone and Dolly Parton."

Nicolino said he is working with R. Singer and Soma Grismaijer, authors of Dressed to Kill: The Link Between Breast Cancer and Bras on the project.

"I first got involved when the authors contacted me about creating a public event surrounding this idea, and I was delighted with it," Nicolino said.

Nicolino said the book advances the theory of a negative impact from wearing constricting clothing, particularly bras. He also said the book shows results from a study stating that in non-bra-wearing countries, the rate of breast cancer patients with the disease in their family history were one in 168, whereas in Nebraska, the rate is one in 8.

"Even though this research has been done, it is being virtually ignored," he said. "So we're going to the president."

Nicolino said he has worked on a similar project before.

"In 1994 I did a project called 'Bras Across the Grand Canyon,' which dealt with social and political commentary," Nicolino said. "It was a personal and artistic expression around breast obsession in Western cultures."

Although the main concept of the tapestry is a political statement, Nicolino said he thought the artistic aspect of the project was equally important.

"I view this project as something pretty unique," he said. "Thousands of people can participate in one single artistic adventure. The idea of getting many people involved is really exciting to me."

Nicolino said the tapestry will travel to cities where more than 1,000 bras are donated, and he invited women in Lincoln to join in on the offerings.

Anyone who is interested in donating should send their bras to: The National Bra Tapestry, 4298 Vineland Avenue, Studio City, Calif., 91602

Nebraska students don milk mustaches

By Anne Heitz
Daily Nebraskan

LINCOLN, Neb. (U-Wire) — More than 150 students walked away from the Nebraska Union on Thursday afternoon wiping their upper lips and licking their fingers clean.

They had just downed a milkshake while trying to don the one perfect white mustache that could win them a spot in a national milk advertisement.

Creativity abounded.

John McNally, a sophomore political science major, saw his big, toothy grin in the milk contest as a great opportunity for stardom.

"I'm hoping this might be my claim to fame," McNally said, adding he wanted students to see what their future governor looked like.

Another spunky contestant wore a white doctor's lab coat and safety goggles while holding a beaker filled with milk, said milk campaign spokesman Bill Hyland.

And another wore a bold Super Woman costume, spokesman Brooke Shepard added.

"You can tell when someone's having fun," Hyland said.

The milk campaign is on a 100-city nationwide search for the perfect university milk mustache model.

The national winner will appear in a milk ad in Rolling Stone magazine.

One winning University of Nebraska-Lincoln student will appear in a Daily Nebraskan milk ad and on the national milk World Wide Web site at http://www.whymilk.com.

Hyland said the contest judges likely will choose the most creative contest entrant as the winner. The UNL winner will be announced in about two or three weeks.

The purpose of the contest is to improve students' milk-drinking habits, said Susan Drew, a registered dietitian with the milk tour.

Few students drink enough milk to get their recommended daily dose of bone-building calcium, she said.

"We're not asking them to give anything up," she said. "We're asking them to add something on."

Drew said the milk mustache campaign does a good job of promoting milk.

"Students will rethink their drinking habits," she said.

Hyland said more UNL students than expected entered the contest. He stayed busy giving pep talks to those posing for the camera.

"Show the camera why you like to drink milk!" he yelled. "Tip it all the way back! I want to see happiness, and I want to see fun!"

In the end, UNL students' involvement impressed Hyland, he said.

"We've seen a lot of good mustaches."

Students combat noise with loud music

By Carrie Beth Lasley
The Maneater

COLUMBIA, Mo. (U-Wire) — There were no afternoon naps for the men of Wolpers Hall at the University of Missouri on Wednesday.

Residents decided to take revenge on construction workers who had awakened them with hammering and pounding on the Black Culture Center. They used their short-range radio station, 93.3 FM, to play loud music directed toward the workers.

Phil Shockley, director of campus facilities, said he spoke to the contractor for the construction project on Wednesday.

"We were aware of the situation," he said. "We spoke to the contractor. The contractor is working within the guidelines of the contract, which is no excessive noise prior to 8 a.m. or after 6 p.m."

Since Wednesday, the contractor moved a compressor to the south side of the project, away from the building, to alleviate the noise problem, Shockley said.

Wolpers resident Jeff Samson said music was played to try to protest the early morning noise.

"For the last couple months, they've been working early, making noise, keeping people from sleeping," he said. "We're getting sick and tired of it, and with finals coming up, we decided something has to be done."

Residents played music out windows from 7 a.m. until 5 p.m. They played such recordings as Leeann Rimes yodeling, the Muppets and Sesame Street, said Wolpers resident Loal Isaacs.

He said the main point of the day was not to annoy construction workers.

"It wasn't just the music," Isaacs said. "There was a petition."

"The petition was to get construction time delayed until 9 a.m.," Wolpers resident Justin Clark said. "It was mainly to show the construction workers how many people were angry about the noise before the 8 a.m. starting time."

About 150 signatures were collected at the Wolpers front desk, and additional copies were passed out to community advisers, Isaacs said.

Clark said the music was not the first method residents had used to quiet the clamor. Campus administrators received e-mails with no audible response. No further plans of action were in process if the noise continued.

Isaacs said noises that have awakened residents before, such as jackhammers, banging of metal, drilling and other intrusive noises, did not wake students Thursday morning.

"It was perfectly quiet this morning," he said.

"We really hurt ourselves when we lost those kind of scoring opportunities," Sortino said.

In the fourth inning, sophomore Crystal Henderson hit a triple to center field, then scored on a throwing error by Scofield, who was playing shortstop.

Sortino brought freshman Carrie Jeffries in for senior Liz Wagner after the run. She also brought in Henderson in during the sixth inning, when Jeffries began to give up hits.

"I hated to pull Liz Wagner," Sortino said. "I thought she was throwing a great game, but the way we were hitting the ball, I felt we had to make a change. I thought all three pitchers did a good job."

UMass tied the game in the fifth inning, when Gutridge hit an RBI single to bring in Galas. The Tar Heels came back in the sixth inning, as senior Brandy Arthur snuck home for an unearned run.

The Minutewomen attempted to rally in the bottom of the seventh. Osier hit a single to center field, and then stole second. Gutridge grounded out to the pitcher, allowing Osier to advance to third. George was walked, and then Smith was unable to bring in Osier, grounding out to the pitcher.

On Saturday, UMass swept a doubleheader with Atlantic 10 foe Rhode Island, 1–0 and 4–1. Henderson pitched the first game, allowing the Rams no hits, and coming one walk away from a perfect game. The Minutewomen scored their only run of the game in the fifth when Gutridge hit an RBI single to right field, bringing in Galas.

In the second game, Gutridge also brought in Galas, hitting an RBI single in the first inning. UMass then scored three insurance runs in the fifth when Galas had a terrific two-RBI triple over URI's rightfielder. Galas then scored herself on a throwing error by the shortstop.

"I thought it [the hit] was flat-out awesome," Sortino said.

at bat, but she gets a lot of quality at bats for us. Becky is a very unselfish player, and she is a consummate team player.

"I can't say enough about her."

Combined with Galas, senior captain Tracy Osier is one of the setup hitters in the UMass lineup. Whether it is Gutridge or George, the centerfielder is confident on the base paths when either player is at the plate.

"I'm very confident when she is at the plate, because Becky is a real fighter to the end," Osier said. "She's a very aggressive player in general, and I would go to war for her if I had to. I have a tremendous amount of respect for her.

"To do what she has done after the back injury, and keep a positive attitude, is a testament to her. She's a real leader on this team."

For George, it is all about keeping her spot in the line-up, and after another gritty performance, you can ink her for the long haul — in whatever capacity.

"As long as I'm playing, I'll be fine," George said. "I consider myself more of an all-around player anyway. We're halfway through the season, and I definitely feel good about our chances, but time will tell."

An interesting metaphor, because Time has finally been good to George, and now, it is her time to shine.

The UMass women's lacrosse team was also in Philadelphia for its tilt against St. Joseph's, which the Minutewomen won, 10–2 on Saturday.

Freshman attack Fay Naber pocketed four goals in the win, as UMass upped its record to 5–3.

Seven different Minutewomen scored, including junior Laura Korutz, who tallied two goals and two assists to help UMass. Senior Jen Herker added a goal and two assists, while sophomore Noelle Gorski contributed two assists.

Freshman goalie Tara Durkin made five saves in her time in the UMass net, and classmate Jen Nardi matched that total with her net play in the second half.

The Massachusetts women's water polo team proved why it is ranked No. 6 in the nation, with its 16–2 drubbing of No. 20 Harvard at Totman Pool Saturday.

Sophomore Marci Hupp tallied five goals to lead the Minutewomen, who stand at 21–3, 9–0 in the Collegiate Water Polo Association. The win over the Crimson also gives UMass its 13th straight win, good for the best mark in school history.

Junior Andrea Vazquez scored three goals, Katie Grogan added a pair, and Sarah Newell. Junior goalie Peggy Nieves made 11 saves for UMass.

The UMass men's track and field team beat Holy Cross, Iona and Providence in the team's second and last home meet of the year Saturday.

Sophomore Vic Morrency won both the javelin and the discus, and junior Albie Vazquez set a new school record in the pole vault with a jump of 14–feet–11.

The Massachusetts women's track and field team received two wins each from Rosey Bryan and Shana Mitchell, as the Minutewomen topped Northeastern, Boston College, Boston University, Brown and Southern Connecticut in a meet Saturday.

For complete wrap-ups of these stories, please see tomorrow's Collegian.

going into the final quarter. But as they did in the third quarter, the Minutemen came out firing. Unfortunately for the Minutemen, so did the Greyhounds. And whenever UMass chipped away at the lead, Loyola would find an answer.

"What we did was stop their momentum," Frye said.

John Madigan tallied an extra-man goal to pull UMass to within two at 8–6; Mike Battista — a Massachusetts native — responded a minute later. Jeremy Guski stuck a Minuteman attack past Brown with 7:11 remaining, but Chris Georgalas negated that score with one of his own. Madigan pocketed the last goal of the afternoon on an assist from Jason Hetrize with 4:18 left.

"It's frustrating," said Kasselakis, whose career-high 20 saves earned him the selection as UMass' most valuable player of the game. "We gave an overall team defensive effort, to lose is just frustrating."

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Others are bound to know, quite instinctively, if you're keeping a secret. It is best to reveal all you know today, when asked.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You must be sure to get one thing done today before moving on to the next. A subsequent endeavor is likely to take up much more time and energy.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You have a big project coming up, and you must be sure that you're prepared. Talk with people openly and share your plans.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You won't be able to get everything done on your own today, and you must pick and choose your assistants with great care.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You can inspire others to commit to something to which they may have been doubtful in the past. You can prove it will work!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Do not make the mistake of excluding friends from a current endeavor. Cooperation can yield greater pleasure and profit. All for one!

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Do not commit to a new project today until you know precisely what role you will be playing and just how and when you'll be compensated.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You may be tempted to cry foul today, but it is best for you to overlook minor offenses and infractions. Turn the other cheek.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Style and substance can go hand in hand today. You are in a fine position to teach others the value of this combination.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You aren't likely to encounter much opposition today, but proceed cautiously nevertheless, as other hazards may be hidden from you.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — Someone is trying to send you an important message today, so you must do your best to be available for all incoming calls. Do not hide!

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — Someone may catch you in a contradiction today that may make things more confusing than necessary. It was all unintentional.

UM softball uses all–around effort for three wins

Henderson continues pitching dominance

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

Danielle Henderson just keeps getting better.

Yesterday she threw her third consecutive no-hitter, in the first game of a double–header with North Carolina. The Massachusetts softball team won by a score of 4–0, and Henderson upped her season strikeout total to 230.

UMass dropped the second game to the Tar Heels, losing by a score of 2–1.

North Carolina	0

Henderson is currently ranked second in the nation in strikeouts per game with 11.3. She narrowly trails the nation's leader, Texas' Christa Williams, at 11.5. She is also 28th in the nation in ERA, at 0.92 and has not allowed a hit in 26.2 innings of work.

North Carolina	2
Massachusetts	1

The team as a whole is currently ranked by the National Fast–Pitch Coaches Association as third in the also receiving votes category.

In the day's first game, UMass scored three runs in the third inning. With junior Mandy Galas on second and junior Tracey Osier on first, senior Kim Gutridge hit a single, advancing Galas to third base, while Osier was caught at second. Coach Elaine Sortino put junior Katie Kenderski in to pinch run for Gutridge, and she quickly stole second base.

Rhode Island	0

Junior Becky George hit a single to center field, allowing both Galas and Kenderski to score. George then advanced to second on a poor throw by UNC, and advanced again to third base when freshman Annie Smith grounded out to the pitcher. Senior Kelly Buckley had the next at–bat, and singled down the right filed line to bring in George.

Massachusetts	4
Rhode Island	1

Henderson didn't allow North Carolina to get anything across in the top of the fourth. In the bottom of the inning freshman Kiley Scofield scored an unearned insurance run for UMass. She was walked to first by Tar Heel pitcher Radara McHugh, and then advanced to second on an error by the first baseman. Junior Octavia Brown hit a sacrifice bunt to advance Scofield to third, and she then scored off of an RBI single from Osier.

"We put our hits together a lot better in the first game," Sortino said.

UMass and Henderson hung on to the lead for the rest of the game, earning their sixth consecutive win, and Henderson her 13th shutout of the season. The game was the 14th time Henderson had fanned double digits in consecutive starts.

In the second game UMass was unable to capitalize on scoring opportunities, and allowed North Carolina to score two unearned runs. In the first inning, Galas was walked to first, but was called out at first base. She had attempted to steal second while Osier was at bat, but failed to dive back to the bag when Osier struck out. The call meant a lost scoring opportunity for UMass, when Gutridge hit a double. UMass lost the same kind of opportunity in the fourth inning when Kenderski was called out at first base.

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Danielle Henderson, who is second in the nation in strikeouts and has not allowed a hit in 26.2 innings, threw her third no–hitter of the week yesterday.

George improves into the spotlight

Yesterday afternoon, junior pitcher Danielle Henderson only pitched her third no–hitter of the week in a 4–0 win over North Carolina.

It can be officially said — the ace of the Massachusetts softball team is "good," but it's getting a little boring to keep heaping the applause on only one Minutewoman. A team has to score runs to win, as was proven by UMass (25– 12) in their 2–1 loss in the nightcap against UNC (29–17).

Meandering amongst the shadows of Henderson on the defense, and senior first baseman Kim Gutridge on the offense, junior Becky George has fought off a tough back injury to quietly establish a rock solid place in the Minutewoman lineup — in the field, and most importantly yesterday afternoon, at the plate as well.

Jorma Kansanen

The thanks for the Minutewomen's game–winning RBI in the first game of the afternoon can be given to George, and her third–inning double was the difference.

"When you have runners in scoring position, all you want to do is put the ball in play," George said. "You're not thinking home run at the plate, but you are thinking of keeping the ball on the ground. It didn't take too much."

But, you ask, "Becky who?"

In her three years so far at UMass, if you asked a softball outsider where George played, you might get something like a bad Abbott and Costello routine in reply "Um, Kim's on first, Mandy [Galas] is at second, but who's at short?" Becky used to be, but we'll get back to that one later.

At the plate, if you asked that same outsider where George hit in the lineup, you probably would have found better luck asking the Witness Protection Program. With a .220 lifetime batting average going into this season, and a steady spot in the batting boonies (otherwise known as the eight spot), George has historically been "oh so quiet" at the plate.

Like a bell, however, the native of Schnecksville, Pa. has begun to hear the ring of the ball jumping off the aluminum bat on a frequent basis. George put the exclamation mark on the 4–1 victory with a quality at bat amidst a series of quality at bats on the day.

After Galas reached third base on a dropped pop fly to center by Gutridge, runners were at the corners for UMass' new cleanup hitter — yes, as opposed to the eight spot.

After pinchrunner Katie Kenderski stole second, George knocked the solid double up the middle, giving the Minutewomen their game–winning and insurance runs in one tight package. The new leftfielder for UMass, due to freshman Kiley Scofield taking over at shortstop, was in the offensive mix all day, drawing three walks while going 2– for–4 to raise her batting average to .315 on the season — yes, almost 100 over her career average before 1998.

UMass coach Elaine Sortino is the first to applaud George's work ethic on and off the field, and not only for this season, but for all three of her years as a Minutewoman.

"Becky's having the year of her life," Sortino said. "She's hitting the ball hard, and she may not get a hit every time

Loyola too much in lacrosse battle

Goalie Kasselakis stops career–high 20 in effort

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

BALTIMORE — There are several reasons Massachusetts men's lacrosse goaltender John Kasselakis is considered among the best goalies in collegiate lacrosse. Chalk Saturday's performance against Loyola College (8–1) up as one more.

However, there are also several reasons Loyola attackman Tim O'Shea is considered a leader on a strong Greyhound squad. Count his two goals against the Minutemen (6–2) Saturday among those reasons.

The battle of the defensive stalwart and the offensive power — and their respective teams — was everything it should have been as the Greyhounds defeated UMass, 10–8, in the Ikon Lacrosse Classic at Johns Hopkins University.

Minuteman coach Greg Cannella was concerned about his team's confidence heading into the weekend matchup, and the game's first–quarter gave every indication UMass was still feeling the effect's of its 15–4 loss to Duke last week.

Loyola coach Dave Cottle was also worried about his team's attitude coming into Saturday's contest. His Greyhounds were still celebrating their 18–15 win over then– No. 2 Syracuse the week before. He needn't have worried.

Loyola's Gewas Schindler jumped all over the UMass defense to set the early tone of the game as he took a pass from O'Shea to score off the opening face–off just seven seconds into the game.

Three minutes later, Schindler struck again, this time with an unassisted tally. Loyola's Mark Goettleman, Mark Frye and Todd Vizcarrondo all followed as the Greyhounds reeled off five unanswered first–quarter scores.

"We struggled last week in practice," Cannella said. "I was concerned about our confidence from last week's game."

Those concerns dissipated in the second quarter — and for remainder of the game — as UMass came out Inspired.

Mike McKeefrey stopped the bleeding for the Minutemen with UMass' first of the game. The junior attackman came around the back of the cage on Loyola keeper Jim Brown's left side and dodged away from his defender before sticking the ball low past Brown.

"Mike McKeefrey played a great game," senior midfielder Mike DelPercio said. "He works his butt off and he helped the team a lot. We need that from him."

DelPercio helped the team himself with UMass' only goal of the second quarter. He received a Chris Martens feed, took one step and fired on Brown.

UMass goalie John Kasselakis, seen here carrying the ball against Duke, made a career–high 20 saves against No. 5 Loyola Saturday in the Ikon Lacrosse Classic.

Even though the Minutemen only scored once, the UMass defense would only allow the Greyhounds to match that total. Frye tallied his second of the game on a shot with eight seconds remaining before intermission.

Whatever was missing from the offensive side of the ball for UMass was found when the teams returned to the field. Immediately, the Minutemen knocked home three in a row, as McKeefrey, Alex Racioppi and DelPercio found their way past Brown.

That set up what proved to ultimately be the turning point of the contest. Staring at a one–goal game, O'Shea fired a shot from 10–feet out past Kasselakis with 2:43 remaining in the third. Less than a minute later, he played a mirror image of the shot into the UMass goal.

"[O'Shea] stuck the ball when he had some chances and that was the turning point," Cannella said.

"At first we were a little surprised they were coming back," O'Shea said. "Those were big goals, but anybody could have scored those two."

O'Shea's goals put UMass in a three–goal deficit

The Massachusetts baseball team traveled to Philadelphia to take on Atlantic 10 foe Temple, where they split a Friday double–header with the Owls.

The Minutemen (15–8, 7–1 A–10) picked up the day's first win, 7–2. Temple (12–18, 4–4) took the second game, 5–3.

Muchie Dagliere extended his hitting streak to 22 games with his performance on the afternoon.

Bill Cooke (5–1) earned the complete game victory in the first contest, allowing two runs on seven hits. He also threw two walks and eight strikeouts. Ryan Cameron (3–3) took the loss in the second game.

Russia will boycott G–7 meetings

MOSCOW (AP) — Russia won't attend this week's meeting of Group of Seven finance ministers in Washington because it has not been granted the status it deserves in the organization, the head of the Central Bank said yesterday.

"We've informed our partners that we aren't willing to participate in the format we have in the past," said bank chairman Sergei Dubinin.

The members of the G–7, the leading industrialized nations of the world, have brought Russia into the group to help it maintain its international prestige after the collapse of the Soviet Union. After meetings last year, the group was informally dubbed the G–8. But while President Boris Yeltsin regularly participates in summits of heads of state, Russian officials have been junior participants in talks among top economic officials.

Lower income people fare well with MA taxes

WASHINGTON (AP) — Two days before the 1997 tax–filing deadline, a new study showed that lower income people do relatively well when it comes to income taxes in Massachusetts, which doesn't tax families below the poverty line.

But the poor face other financial obstacles in the high–cost state.

According to the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, half the 42 states with income taxes still impose those taxes on three– and four–person families living at or below the poverty line.

Massachusetts was one of three states that made changes last year so that those families don't pay any state income tax, the study said. In Massachusetts, a tax credit was enacted that provides money — up to several hundred dollars in some cases — to families who don't earn enough to owe tax.

"The progress states have made is laudable," said Nicholas Johnson, co–author of the study. "But what's truly surprising is that more states haven't taken advantage of a strong economy and higher–than–expected revenues to provide more tax relief to the working poor."

In Massachusetts, two–parent families of four begin paying income tax when they earn $17,400. The federal poverty line is $16,405. For families of three with one parent, the income tax kicks in at $16,400. The poverty line for those families is $12,804.

SGA election ratification still up in the air; decision may not be made for another month

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

The decision to ratify or nullify the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) elections may not be handed down from the student judiciary for a month.

According to the SGA constitution the student judiciary has 30 days from the time of hearing complaints about the elections to make a decision. Then the associate speaker of the senate has 14 days to hand in the written decision.

Chief Justice LaToya Simms could not comment on a possible date for a decision to be handed down.

"It is a long, tedious process. That's about all I can say," Simms said.

Speaker of the senate Peter Kilbourne said the decision could come at any time.

"I hope we hear something [yesterday] or [today] because Chuck DiMare (Student Legal Services Office Directing Attorney) is going on vacation [today]. We don't know if they are deliberating or writing the report [supporting their decision]," Kilbourne said.

DiMare could not be reached for comment.

The judiciary heard the complaint April 2 which means the entire process of deliberating and writing the decision could be finished as late as May 16.

One complaint petition was filed by Jesse Burchfield and Brenda Fitzpatrick.

They charged former Chancellor of Elections, Carlos Alvarez with running the elections using unconstitutional practices.

The primary complaint against Alvarez was the absence of absentee ballots at polling places. It is written in the SGA constitution that absentee ballots must be provided at polling places. Because they were only provided at one polling place this would make the elections unconstitutional. This is a basis to nullify the elections.

Because Alvarez had already resigned as Chancellor of Elections action could not be taken against him. However the elections could be thrown out if the complaints in the petition are found to be true.

Other complaints included polling places opening late and only one elections commissioner manning the polling places instead of the required two.

If elections are nullified new elections may not be able to be held this semester.

"The longer we wait the less likely it is to re–do the elections this semester, if these elections are nullified," Kilbourne said.

Amy Pellegrino, who was voted in the elections as SGA president, felt a nullification of the elections would be counterproductive.

"It seems counterproductive to do it twice," Pellegrino said.

However, Kilbourne feels there were too many mistakes made to be able to ratify the elections.

"The evidence, in my opinion, points to the fact that there was a lot of error," Kilbourne said. "The results are irrelevant. The process was unjust."

Pellegrino was also concerned a precedent would be set if these elections were nullified.

"If you throw out these elections then you might as well have the third. I don't know where this might be going maybe best three out of five," Pellegrino said.

Kilbourne felt students should not have been denied a vote.

"We have proof many students were denied the right to vote because we did not provide absentee ballots," Kilbourne said.

Kilbourne was also concerned ratification of the elections could lead to the University being sued.

"If one person could prove that they didn't get to vote they could get a lawyer and sue us," Kilbourne said.

The decision of ratification or nullification of the elections could be further delayed by charges against Chief Justice LaToya Simms that were discussed at a meeting of the Rules and Ethics Committee last night.

Senator Dan Backer (Commuter At–Large) brought forth allegations in a petition to the committee that Simms said she would throw out the elections.

"LaToya Simms said something to the effect of 'I am going to throw out these elections,'" Backer said in the petition.

Backer called for the impeachment of Simms.

"I am calling for impeachment if that is what is required," Backer said.

Simms said she did not make any comment concerning the elections.

"I have yet to say anything about the decision of the judiciary," Simms said. "I have never said it, never said it, never said it."

A decision of whether to begin impeachment proceedings against Simms was tabled to a later meeting when senators claiming to be witnesses of Simms making the comment can come before the Rules and Ethics Committee.

Pellegrino commented on the damage the controversy surrounding the elections has caused.

"I'm doing my damndest to try to restore it. If I could be just left alone to tackle the SGA credibility it could be a great year," Pellegrino said.

Kilbourne also felt SGA credibility had been damaged.

"We lost a lot respect by students if we had just allowed them to vote," Kilbourne said.

Pellegrino has been the acting president while the decision of the judiciary is awaited.

"What I have been doing is proceeding as normal. There is a whole bunch of stuff going on," Pellegrino said.

At the time of publication, the judiciary was still meeting regarding ratification of the election.

Challenges to Pulitzer on the rise

NEW YORK (AP) — At least five entries for Pulitzer Prizes this year were challenged for accuracy or fairness by outside parties during the judging process, the Pulitzer administrator said yesterday. The number of such lobbying efforts was greater this year than any time since the board decided in 1994 to let Pulitzer juries see outside challenges, according to Seymour Topping, administrator of the prizes in journalism and the arts.

This year's winners are being announced today.

Pulitzer juries consider hundreds of entries submitted by newspapers in 14 categories and nominate three for the coveted prizes. The Pulitzer Prize Board at Columbia University chooses the winners.

Topping said he personally screens the challenges and then passes along those with substance to the juries.

He said the challenges all have been in the newspaper categories, none in arts and letters.

The efforts to influence the outcome, first reported by The New York Times, was described as beneficial by some board members and former jurors.

"I welcome them," said Geneva Overholser, chairwoman of the Pulitzer board and ombudsman of The Washington Post. "It's better to hear about a problem before rather than after."

"Unless an entry's going to be at the top of the list, you don't pay attention to the complaint. If it is, I want to know everything about it," said board member Andrew Barnes, editor, president and CEO of the St. Petersburg Times in Florida.

Matt Storin, editor of The Boston Globe, which untoretred a series on police misconduct, said: "Challenges are legitimate, but should be withheld until an entry makes it to the finals."

The Globe stories prompted a complaining letter from the police department to the entire Pulitzer board and attracted national attention after the newspaper reported the police had obtained a copy of the newspaper's entry, which Storin called a private document.

Storin said five–member juries burdened with judging as many as 150 entries don't have time to consider a challenge in detail and might use it as a way to pare the list.

William German, editor of the San Francisco Chronicle, said he wouldn't want to encourage complaining letters.

"But part of the rules should be that whoever's accused is given a chance to respond. Then trust the jurors and the board to be just," German said.

The Chronicle submission of a series on the way disabled children are assigned to foster care was the target of a complaint. The other entries challenged by letter writers were The Seattle Times stories on reprocessing of hazardous materials into fertilizer, The Philadelphia Inquirer series on financial operations of the board of Girard College and The Tennessean of Nashville's stories on environmental danger around Oak Ridge, Tenn. Topping and others familiar with the Pulitzers said they thought the challenges came because people assumed certain types of stories were being put up for prizes.

Flynn defends himself

Gubernatorial candidate denies Globe story

BOSTON (AP) — Describing The Boston Globe as arrogant, gubernatorial candidate Ray Flynn denied the newspaper's allegations that he has a drinking problem during a Sunday broadcast of CBS' "60 Minutes."

Flynn defended himself against an Oct. 3, 1997 Globe article criticizing both his drinking and work habits while he served as U.S. ambassador to the Vatican.

"I think there's a certain arrogance in media," Flynn said during the "60 Minutes" interview at J.J. Foley's pub in Boston's South End. "I think the media is basically out of control. I think they're losing their focus of what's important to people." The 58–year–old Flynn was mayor of Boston from 1984 to 1993, served as president of the U.S. Conference of Mayors from 1991–1992, and was U.S. ambassador to the Vatican.

The Globe said Flynn's ambassadorship had been spent "skipping meetings, shunning much paperwork, ignoring some important invitations from his diplomatic peers, and rarely showing his face at the office for months at a stretch."

But the focus of the "60 Minutes" piece was on the paper's decision to publish reports of Flynn's drinking.

"We understood all along that our story about former ambassador Flynn would be controversial," said Globe Editor Matthew V. Storin. "Given his impending candidacy for governor at the time, we were convinced, and remain so, that publication was in the public interest."

The article said former aides often had to help Flynn get home because he had too much to drink.

It also said that on Aug. 6, 1997, Flynn — who was in Boston on vacation — was seen walking out of a restaurant in the city's North End and appeared to be "intoxicated... and walking unsteadily and slurring his speech."

The reporter, Walter V. Robinson — who wrote the article and said he saw Flynn that night — said Flynn was "Disheveled. His shirt was untucked. He reeked of alcohol."

"It's not true," Flynn retorted. "Not as mayor, not at the Vatican, not anywhere has anybody ever said that me stopping at a working class pub and drinking three beers has ever affected my work ethic."

Joe Sciacca, political editor of the Boston Herald, said his paper could find no evidence that Flynn's drinking affected his job as ambassador.

"We sent a reporter, our best political reporter, to Rome, right around the time the Boston Globe was there; went to every tavern Ray Flynn was known to frequent, could not develop — despite our best efforts — information that showed it affected his duties as ambassador. And to we didn't print it."

He also told "60 Minutes" he didn't think the Globe was as critical of former governor William F. Weld.

Smith College lecture to discuss global warming, climate changes tonight

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Unstable weather patterns across the country will be among the topics discussed at tonight's 8 p.m. Smith College lecture, "Have we created El Nino? The real story behind global warming and climate change."

Two guest speakers, Dr. Juan Leon, director of the Union of Concerned Scientists and University of Massachusetts Geoscience department head Raymond Bradley will speak on problems concerning global warming.

The Union of Concerned Scientists wrote a statement about their questions of fossil fuel use. The uses of these fuels: coal, oils and gas are creating a climate change, the statement said.

Signed by 1,500 scientists in 65 countries — 109 of whom are Nobel Prize winners — the statement is being used to aid them in creating alternative types of energy, said Anita King, member of the Population Committee of the Pioneer Valley Sierra Club, who is sponsoring the lecture.

"They [Union of Concerned Scientists] are on the forefront of educating the public in terms of finding alternative types of fuel," she said.

Bradley has been studying the effects of climate change for over 20 years and has focused his works on climatology and climate variations.

He has served on various government agencies, including the inter–governmental panel on climate change and the international geosphere and biosphere.

"This lecture is very timely," King said, referring to the recent tornadoes in the southern part of the US, floods on the west coast and summer–like days in New England last month.

In addition to the Sierra Club, the lecture is co–sponsored by the Project on Women and Social Change from Smith College, the Family Planning Council of Western Mass., Earth Act, MassPIRG, National Audobon Society, the Union for Concerned Scientists, 5–College Peace and Western Security Studies and the Smith College President's office.

The lecture begins at 8 p.m. in the Nielson Library and is free and open to the public.

Virginia asked to block execution

By Richard Carelli
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright asked Virginia's governor to block today's planned execution of a death-row inmate from Paraguay, saying she was concerned about the "potential harm" to Americans abroad.

Albright made the request "with great reluctance" yesterday in a letter to Gov. James Gilmore. A spokesman, Mark Miner, said the governor was reviewing Albright's request but would wait to see how the Supreme Court rules in the case.

But the Justice Department urged the Supreme Court to allow the execution of Angel Francisco Breard to proceed, despite pleas for a postponement by the government of Paraguay and the World Court. The high-level split between two federal agencies on whether to stay the execution was outlined in the Justice Department's brief to the Supreme Court and was confirmed by State Department officials.

Albright, in her letter to Gilmore, fully endorsed the U.S. position before the World Court but said she had the "responsibility to bear in mind the safety of Americans overseas."

"I am particularly concerned about the possible negative consequences for the many U.S. citizens who live and travel abroad," Albright wrote. The immediate execution of Breard could be seen as a denial by the United States of international law and the World Court, she said.

The Justice Department, in its brief, noted Albright's request to the governor as a proper exercise of persuasion in a case where a World Court order does not provide a basis for U.S. courts to act.

Breard, a citizen of Paraguay, was convicted of the 1992 stabbing death of Ruth Dickie in her Arlington, Va., apartment. The World Court said Breard's case violated a treaty with Paraguay because that country's consulate was not notified. While acknowledging that Breard was not allowed to meet with someone from the consulate, the Justice filing contends "there is no basis for concluding that the assistance of a consular officer would have changed the outcome of the criminal proceedings.

Hazing investigated at Kappa Alpha Psi

By Todd Spangler
Associated Press

PRINCESS ANNE, Md. — Five college students were beaten so severely with wooden paddles and canes during a two-month fraternity initiation they had to be hospitalized, state police said yesterday.

Some of the pledges of Kappa Alpha Psi at the University of Maryland, Eastern Shore underwent surgery last week for cuts and infections on their buttocks from being spanked daily from Feb. 8 to April 4, according to police and family members.

"Anyone who would do this to someone else is a vicious animal," said Cynthia Pinkney, whose son, Andre Smith Clemensia, a 19-year-old from Clinton, was among those injured.

No arrests have been made.

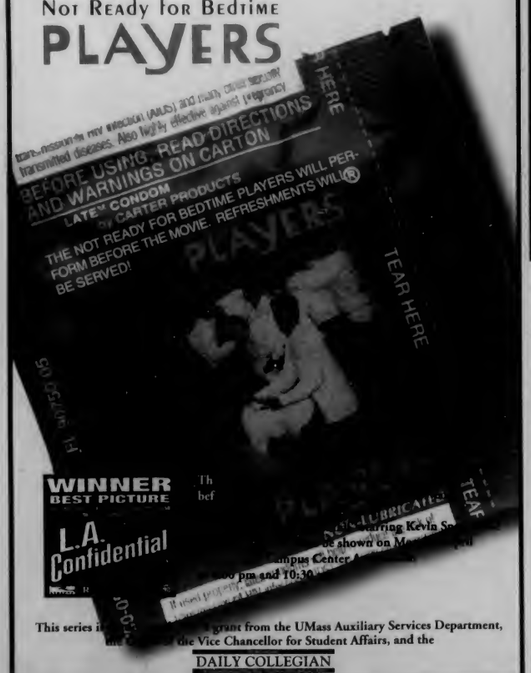
Yesterday, the university suspended Kappa Alpha Psi, canceling all the fraternity's activities at the small, historically black college until the investigation is complete.

The chapter president of Kappa Alpha Psi told university officials the injuries occurred at a function in Baltimore and were not related to the fraternity's initiation, according to a release issued by UMES.

Police said one student was released from the hospital over the weekend. Hospital officials would not provide any information on the other students' conditions nor say whether they were still hospitalized.

Richard Snow, executive director of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity Inc., based in Philadelphia, said the fraternity takes hazing very seriously.

"We prosecute anyone, or assist in prosecuting anyone, who participates in an illegal act under name of Kappa Alpha Psi," he said.



Kappa Alpha Psi reached a $2.25 million settlement in December 1996 with the family of Michael Davis, who died after being beaten, body-slammed and kicked in the chest by fraternity members at Southeast Missouri State in February of 1993.

Insurability questions raised

By Maggie Jackson
Associated Press

For years, executives at Astra USA pressured women workers for sex and punished those who objected. Yet in the midst of its troubles, the drugmaker was able to buy sexual harassment insurance.

The company recently agreed to pay a record $10 million to settle a harassment lawsuit, restructured its personnel department and implemented sexual harassment training. But the case highlights serious questions raised by the recent corporate drive to buy harassment insurance.

Are insurers looking closely enough at the companies they sell to? Will companies — which spend up to $500,000 a year on the insurance — relax once their coffers are protected?

"There's a danger that sexual harassment can become just a cost of doing business for those who've invested in insurance coverage," said Jonathan Turley, a law professor at George Washington University.

Companies insured for sexual harassment will have less incentive to avoid lawsuits because their legal costs won't come out of their own pockets, he said. "Corporate cultures respond to the bottom line."

Insurer David Sterling, meanwhile, believes the industry is lowering its standards of risk assessment in order to sell more policies. "There are so many insurance companies competing, those (pre-sale) demands have dropped," he said. Other insurers disagree.

Michael Furgueson, vice president of Chubb Insurance, said most insurers check a company's programs carefully. But he said he "can't say every underwriting process is flawless in uncovering what goes on in a company."

Before selling a policy, insurers typically check company rules on sexual harassment, financial statements and past lawsuits or allegations. After a policy is sold, some insurers offer more in-depth advice on a company's risk of being sued.

At Chubb, underwriters study handbooks, finances, programs and litigation trends before making a sale, although they don't audit company procedures out of concern that results could be used against the company in potential lawsuits. Chubb also offers companies lists of law firms that provide seminars in harassment-prevention.

It's not hard to see why companies are shopping for coverage. Sexual harassment charges filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission rose to 15,889 last year from 6,883 in 1991, while monetary settlements paid to victims leaped to nearly $50 million last year from $7 million seven years ago.

"We're not even chasing people to buy this coverage," said Sterling, co-owner of Sterling & Sterling insurance brokers in Great Neck, N.Y.

Sterling has been selling four policies a week for the last few months — a period when Paula Jones' sex harrassment lawsuit against President Clinton made headlines before being thrown out of court. A year ago, he sold two policies a month.

Companies don't buy a specific harassment policy. Rather, they purchase Employment Practices Liability insurance, created in the early 1990s to cover harassment, wrongful termination and discrimination. Still, insurers say fears of harassment suits are driving sales — and the increasing size of the coverage.

Midsize companies that wanted $2.5 million in coverage last year now are asking for $10 million limits, said Lisa DeSimone, vice president of employment practices liability at Reliance National insurers. Companies pay up to $500,000 for $25 million in coverage, she said.

For Vitncam, a company that provides employees as a longer-term version of temps, the decision to buy the insurance meant boosting its prices, but clients supported the move, said Jeff Lamb, vice president of marketing and business development. "Businesses want to know there's something in back of them should the unknown occur," he said.

At Astra, harassment of women began at least as far back as 1993, according to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. A year later, the Westborough, Mass., company purchased Employment Practices Liability Insurance. The EEOC began investigating complaints from women employees in 1996.

"Our insurance brokers advised us that this was a trend in the industry and it was an investment we would want to consider," said Astra spokeswoman Ann Gillespie, who refused to name the insurer or the size of the policy.

Protestants avoid Catholic area — a sign of compromising times?

By Shawn Pogatchnik
Associated Press

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — Taking their cue from last week's sweeping peace accord for Northern Ireland, Protestant marchers avoided a hostile Catholic neighborhood yesterday that has frequently been a sectarian battleground.

This symbolic start to Northern Ireland's always divisive "marching season," which runs from Easter Monday to late August, demonstrated the kind of retreats that will be required for the peace agreement to survive the coming months.

Police blocked the early morning march by 20 Apprentice Boys, one of Northern Ireland's three pro-British Protestant fraternal orders, at a bridge a few hundred yards from the Catholic Lower Ormeau neighborhood of south Belfast.

The marchers handed the police commander a letter of protest. But rather than mounting the kind of lengthy standoff that in past years has ended in violence, they and an accompanying band immediately boarded a bus to join another parade in a mostly Protestant town.

Later, speakers at Apprentice Boys rallies condemned the compromises contained in last Friday's accord — which Northern Ireland's largest Protestant party, David Trimble's Ulster Unionists, supported.

"For Sale!" read one leaflet, picturing a silhouette of Northern Ireland. It was handed out to some of the more than 10,000 Apprentice Boys rallying at Ballymena, northwest of Belfast. "Estate agent: Mr. David Trimble and the Ulster Unionist Party." Many Protestants oppose key compromises in the agreement: That several hundred Irish Republican Army prisoners will be released within two years if the IRA's July 1997 truce holds; that the IRA-allied Sinn Fein party can take part in a new Northern Ireland Assembly; and that Assembly must pursue joint policy-making with the Irish Republic.

The agreement accepted by negotiators from the Ulster Unionists, Sinn Fein and six other parties has to be passed in public referendums May 22 in both Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic. Two hard-line Protestant parties that boycotted the talks are already campaigning for a "no" vote.

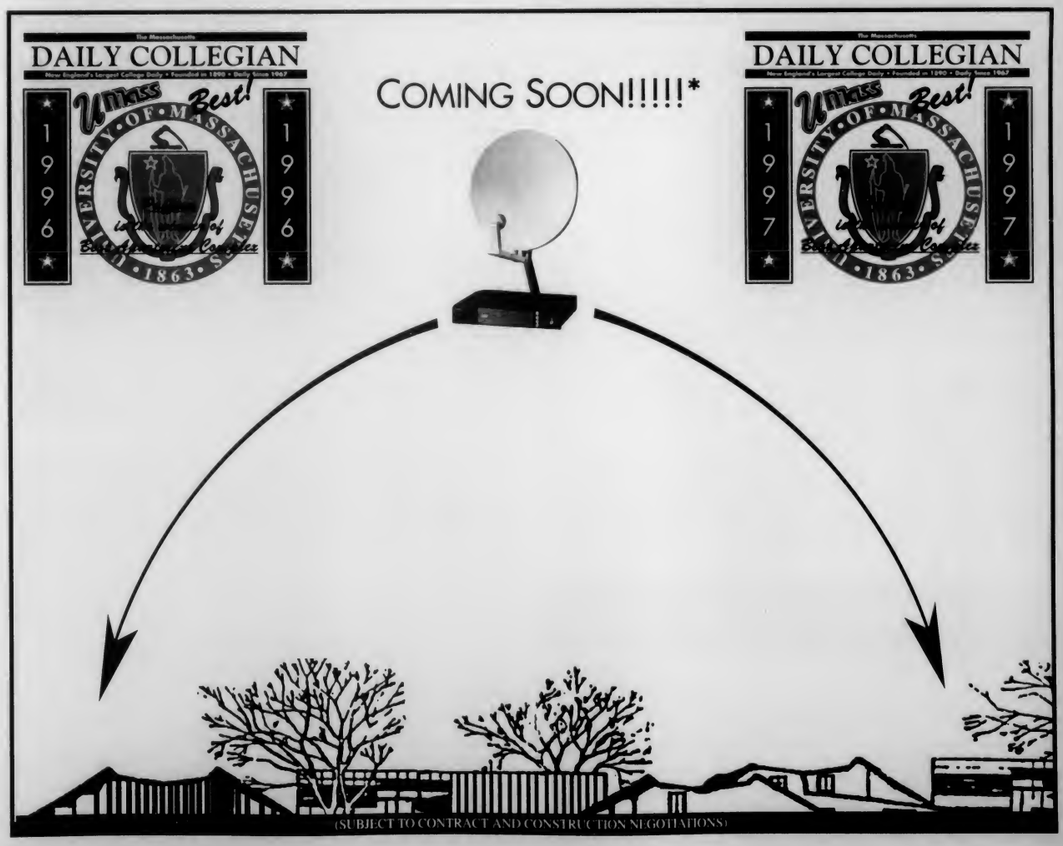
The accord also has to be approved Saturday by the Ulster Unionists' governing body, the 800-member Ulster Unionist Council. And Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams says his party's support depends on approval by its grassroots members at a Sinn Fein conference this weekend in Dublin.

Both Adams and Trimble have been defending the deal as advancing their mutually exclusive goals: for Adams, to unite the north with the rest of Ireland; for Trimble, to ensure Northern Ireland's continued union with Britain.

"The positives outweigh the problems," Trimble wrote in yesterday's Daily Telegraph newspaper. "Despite Gerry Adams' taunts, we have risen from the table with the union stronger than when we first sat down."

Should the accord pass all these electoral tests, Protestants and Catholics trying to work together in the new Assembly will face an immediate challenge unless Protestant marchers and Catholic protesters can resolve their territorial disputes.

Since 1995, protest groups led by paroled IRA members have tried to block Protestant parades from passing near Catholic homes in three key confrontation zones: Belfast's Lower Ormeau neighborhood, Londonderry's Bogside district and Portadown's Garvaghy Road. The Portadown showdown has triggered sustained, widespread violence for the past two July s — and Northern Ireland's police chief says this year looks no different.



"There's still scope for tremendous disorder. That's the reality of life," said Chief Constable Ronnie Flanagan. "As we sit at the minute, I don't see much sign yet of people coming together."

Protestant marching groups insist their parades should offend no one since they simply celebrate the strength of their community and its pro-British, evangelical values.

The north's substantial Catholic minority loathes these parades — complete with fife-and-drum groups nicknamed "kick the pope" bands — as demonstrations of dominance.

In Washington yesterday, George Mitchell, the architect of the Northern Ireland peace accord, told President Clinton the deal could not have been achieved without his help.

Mitchell, meeting with Clinton briefly at the White House, said he hopes the president will visit the region in the coming months. "If it would help, of course I would be willing to go, but I think it's important not to make that decision yet," Clinton said. Mitchell, former Senate majority leader, was appointed by Clinton as his envoy for the peace efforts three years ago.

Rethinking accountability

This being the day before the deadline for tax filing, it might be a good time to reflect a little about some of the less visible things the U.S. government spends our money on.

We all know that tax money keeps our highways maintained, funds perverted artists, subsidizes the profits of private corporations, pays military veterans and provides an easy ride for welfare queens. Or at least we've all probably heard that it's so. But a report by Allan Nairn, in the March 30 issue of The Nation, details a lesser-known use of taxpayer funds: training Indonesia's military to more effectively kill its civilians.

Indonesia, one of the largest nations in the world, has been undergoing some major turmoil lately. You know all that stuff about financial markets in Asia collapsing? Well, a lot of the pressure of the bailout is being imposed on the common people, and they're none too happy. Dictator Suharto's military, a.k.a. ABRI, has been getting busy with beatings, killings, bans on all public gatherings and other methods of intimidating the public to make sure the people know their place. And, thanks to the conniving ways of the Pentagon, ABRI is doing so with good old American know-how.

ABRI has been killing people for years, with plenty of U.S. assistance. There were a lot of people to dispose of back in 1965 when ABRI and Suharto came to power, and thankfully the U.S. government was there then, handing over lists of names of suspected communists. Since 1975, ABRI has slaughtered over a third of the population of East Timor, a country Indonesia took over — again with U.S. patronage. In 1991, at least 271 people were killed in a massacre by ABRI; once again, the U.S. State Department was there with political support and reassurances of friendship.

The United States had been a major supplier of military hardware to Indonesia over the years, until Congress forced the White House to tone it down after the 1991 massacre. We had also brought members of ABRI over here to the U.S. to train them in killing, until Congress rained on that parade, too, reducing the training to human rights lessons. These lessons were to take place in classrooms, instead of the field. It seemed as if key elements of U.S. complicity in ABRI's bloodshed were being deleted.

However, Nairn discovered that the Pentagon is nonetheless running an even more extensive training program than the one Congress eviscerated. ABRI currently receives direct training from fully armed U.S. troops, who are flown over to Indonesia to teach such lethal skills as Advanced Sniper Techniques, Military Operations in Urban Terrain, and Demolition and Small Weapons Instruction.

Most of the classes train a part of ABRI known as the KOPASSUS Red Berets, a group that tortures civilians. Photos of one specific unit performing torture have even been published — a unit that has been given direct training by U.S. military personnel. This training is very much a thing of the present, with approximately 20 sessions scheduled for the remainder of 1998.

Nairn's article is essential — you should get to the library and read it yourself. I sketch it here to bring home this point: We need to consider our role, as taxpayers, in funding such activities.

Although some of us, as students, may not yet be full members of the taxpaying workforce, nearly all of us will be soon. And many of us are working our ways through school with part time jobs, where taxes are deducted each week from our paychecks. That money you work for but don't get at the end of the week helps to maintain the flow of liquid assets the government has available.

We all probably know that tax money often goes to fund activities we don't like. Remember all the stink several years back about how the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) was funding work many thought was obscene? A huge uproar was created when it was revealed that Andres Serrano's work "Piss Christ," a beautiful photo of a crucifix completely immersed in urine, had been produced with NEA support. Since then, pressure from Republicans has decreased the size of the NEA budget dramatically.

But did you know that the entire budget of the NEA is smaller than the amount of money spent on the Marine Marching Band? And, to put things in perspective, is it worse to give money to an artist who produces one controversial work, or to train a KOPASSUS Red Beret who tortures and kills political enemies?

The military budget, even after the end of the Cold War, is still clocking in at close to 53 percent, according to activist Martin Kelley. If we pay our taxes, we are participants, willing or unwilling. Calling our senators and representative to urge their action on specific issues, like the ABRI training, or on larger issues, such as cutting military spending, are options; they might even have some small impact. For those who prefer to refuse their cooperation more directly, not paying the percentage of taxes that fund the military is a path many have chosen. These war tax resisters even include a number of organized religious groups — see http://www.nonviolence.org//wtr/.

Whatever your preference, at tax time just don't forget that it is you and I who pay for, and are responsible for monitoring, what our government does.

English only

"English only; somebody messed up when they put those two words together." So began Edward James Olmos in his speech to UMass students two weeks ago. These words have stuck in my mind, as they should in yours. Olmos continued, saying that he didn't feel bad for those individuals who spoke English only; that he didn't feel bad for their children, but that he did feel bad for their children's children.

At that point, I was reminded of the debates that occurred in California concerning the possibility of enforcing Spanish as the second official language and the subsequent uprising in opposition which drowned out the advocates for this cause. "How could the United States of America, in the 20th century, constitute and implement a second language on a national scale that is not a dialect of the language spoken by its former colonizers?" opponents asked.

"This brings about the issue of whether it is the language that is foreign or whether it is I who am foreign to the language."

Malika Tafawa

And I ask you, "How could the most international country on the face of this earth, where every single ethnic origin is in existence and where 99 percent of the world's languages are spoken, be English only?"

On this campus alone, I cannot walk around for more than an hour without hearing or seeing the interaction between two or more people in an oral language that is different from the one which is acknowledged as the national one. There are times when it even takes me a few minutes to identify what foreign language is being spoken. This brings about the issue of whether it is the language that is foreign or whether it is I who am foreign to the language.

Some view this fact with admiration. These students are promoting a situation which is dynamic in exploring alternative means of communication. It allows those who have not had the opportunity to explore another language to do so on a more practical level than that which is available at the high school level. It is now clear that the problem is perhaps on a larger scale and concerns the motivation behind providing language on the school syllabus at the high school level. The students represent a larger portion of people within the population who are not native to the United States.

Language is a means through which culture is perpetuated. Demoting the formalizing of another language in a nation such as this one tells people they are expected to denounce all that defines them as individuals, all that derives from their family heritage and from those who they are descended from, in order to conform to that which is "American."

As the world becomes a global market, is it not important that an American businesswoman be able to communicate with her partner from Nauru in establishing a deal with a Burmese businessman to market umbrellas in Bangladesh? An individual from Africa who is educated by the formal educational system and wishes to live or work in the West, speaks his native tongue, the language of his respective colonizer and English. Likewise, a Swiss man is considered abnormal if he is fluent in only one language, while living in a country where there are substantial groups of people who speak a total of four main languages. In Japan, every student is taught in English from the first grade. They are expected to speak Japanese and to take an additional language course. I encounter immense difficulty in my attempt to identify the drawbacks of such situations.

Before moving on, it is necessary that we acknowledge that this land is distinct in the fact that we don't have to travel back in history for very long before we find that we are all foreign to it. In our debates to have a range of European languages spoken in this country, we fail to see two very big points. For one thing, in selecting another language that could potentially be the second official language, it is unclear what that language should be. Why are we even arguing to have Spanish as a second official language when one in five people on the face of this earth speak Mandarin? If it is about proportionate population numbers, the advocates for Spanish can again be overruled, for the simple reason that the tendency to have large immigrant Spanish-speaking populations is mainly a reality in specific American states; which, let's not forget, were seized from Mexico in the first place.

There is another issue that has to be addressed. This approach appears to be a very patronizing one, but what about the Native Americans? If we are all about perpetuating a culture that respects the citizens of this great nation, then why is it that the only visible aspects of Native American origin and cultural heritage today are derogatory or used in a manner that severely disrespects the people and their ancestors? Have they not been the only true citizens by birth?

I had a series of discussions with various students on this campus who had a wide range of views. One was, "You can't fully understand what you are, without understanding what you are not." So were the words of Lia Wong. If we all conformed to the "English Only" speaking personality that is encouraged, then sure enough we will be promoting the idea of the melting pot-mentality that presides over American society. At the same time, is it not the practice of seclusion and consequent exclusion of everyone else, if people arrive in this country and live within their own communities and celebrate their own cultures among themselves?

I leave you with this: If all was light, there would be no appreciation of it, as there would be nothing to compare it to. Not only is there a necessity for both light and darkness, but it must be recognized that each possesses its own beauty.

Book of love

Seth Koenig

Relationships. Maybe you've been in one, maybe you haven't. If you've been in one, you know how tough they can be once they pass that line from being a lust thing to a love thing. In fact, many romances self-destruct at that point, because those involved have a hard time dealing with the everyday traits that make up their significant other when the benefit of sex isn't there to sweeten things (let's be honest, we're all willing to deal with some attitude problems for a good roll in the hay).

Well, as a man in a long distance, long-term relationship, I feel that I can make some statements (at least from a male point of view, which, while not necessarily right, is the only point of view I can biologically have), that can be thought of as basic, generalized laws of interaction between the man and the women — or man and man, or woman and woman, whatever — in a relationship.

Now, while many of you out there — mostly from the female population — are prepared for some sexist, biased nonsense and have angry letters to the editor already partially finished, I'd like to include a little pre-attack defense. First of all, I'm not planning to make the women look like evil people, and I'm not planning to make the men look like wonderful people. I realize that both are quite often not the case. I just want to write what I have seen in my experiences with the girl i love (her name is Alison, by the way). If you really love someone, after all, you can recognize their faults (not that I'm writing all about faults) objectively and still adore them as a whole.

And even if I was planning some all-out assault on the female gender, it's not like it would be an unprovoked attack. I don't know how many articles in newspapers and magazines I've read that make overly blatant, sexist statements like "All men are pigs/rats/insects," and back that ignorant statement up with the shady dealings of two or three members of a significantly larger male population.

Anyway, without further ado, Koenig's Laws on Relationships (from a male point of view):

Law #1: Women tend to like flowers. Some will claim otherwise in an attempt to seem as though they're different, but they are most likely just hiding the truth. There's something about pretty plants that die within a week but cost an arm and a leg that they find attractive. Guys, buy the damn flowers. There's something to be said for letting the girl know you appreciate her, and if you don't, then let her go before people get hurt and eyes get poked out and whatnot.

Law #2: if you are a male arguing with a significant other, you are wrong and will apologize. Even if you are right, you are wrong and will apologize. Your only hope for any sort of victory in an argument against a female counterpart is to try and get her to apologize, too.

Law #3: Women tend to like chocolate. More than they tend to like flowers by a long shot. I'm not sure what it is about that stuff, but when I choose butterscotch topping for my ice cream sundae over hot fudge, females look at me like I have two heads.

Law #4: They might try to deny it, but there's no use: females are completely different people during PMS. It's a touchy subject, but it's true. Three out of the four weeks of the month, women can handle anything just short of being completely berated (not that I completely berate my love), but that fourth week — oh my God. If you say hello with a mildly incorrect intonation in your voice, prepare for a verbal slaughter of you, your character, your habits, and your sensitivity. This viscous lashing is often followed by crying, so while you are still reeling from being attacked from all angles, you have to console her.

Law #5: Compromising consists of the two of you suggesting options you know you'd like in a desperate hope that the other will give in. Case in point; my girlfriend and I will go to a video rental store. She'd point out Fools Rush In and I'd counter with Broken Arrow. Then she'll "compromise" to Up Close & Personal and I "compromise" to Face/Off.

Law #6: There must be some kind of sex life there. Yeah, we'll all say that we'd love them anyway — and we might — but things are so much more difficult when you're both sexually frustrated. Dry spells are normal, but if your significant other repulses you for too long, it's time to move on.

Law #7: This is the last law, and is kind of a continuation of Law #6. A good relationship is a trilogy of qualities; love, sex, and friendship. If you love the person and you are great friends, but you aren't turned on by them, then that person is known as your sibling. If you are friends with someone and you occasionally screw around with that person, but do not love them, then you are just horny. And, if you love a person and sleep with that one, but can't stand to be around them when not shagging... well, you won't make it far. You've got to sincerely have all three. Then, you'll be in the perfect romance.

Gun control column off the mark

To the editor:

I am writing in response to Julie Fialkow's column on gun control which recently appeared in the Daily Collegian (April 2).

I am ashamed that our press would even print such an article. I was particularly offended by the first two sentences, which read: "Every time a gun in this country is sold, a free gift certificate for sterilization should be given with it. That way we could be assured that people with guns couldn't bear any children."

Who are you to say something like this? My father owns firearms, his father and many other upstanding American citizens [own firearms]. Your article portrays gun owners to be barbaric and stupid. While some people who own guns are not rocket scientists, my father is a doctor and I am an engineering student. I don't feel we fit into your stereotype.

You sarcastic commenis were also far from amusing. If you really care to know why people in Jonesboro own guns, ask yourself, why do people own baseball bats? To participate in a sport, not to injure people. That goes the same for gun owners. Not to, as you say, "protect themselves from the Arkansas chapter of the Crypts and the Bloods," or "in case their chickens want to step to them," but to target shoot for enjoyment.

Every time an incident like this occurs, we all point our fingers at guns. For the record, I'd like to point out that guns don't kill people, people kill people. As far as penalizing all gun owners for the actions of a select few, that is ridiculous. Why not create stricter penalties and actually enforce them (eye for an eye...). By taking away my guns, I am left at the mercy of any criminal who can get his hands on a firearm.

Thanks to UMass Crew

To the editor:

The board of Directors of the Amherst Survival Center would like to acknowledge and to thank the UMass Crew Team for their generous gift of $1,000 to the Center.

The gift was presented to Vange Westcott, Director of the Amherst Survival Center at the 1998 Crew Team Banquet that was held in March. The banquet was held to recognize the women and men who strive to continue the tradition of hard work and dedication to the sport of rowing.

For the last 30 years, the Crew teams have inducted a new member into the 1871 club. This year Scott Jason, of the Riverdale Boat Club of Boston, was inducted. Scott won senior events at the Royal Canadian Henley Regatta, and finished second at the American Rowing Championships.

The club was established to recognize the "on the water" accomplishments of men and women in pursuit of rowing excellence beyond the UMass Crew. Induction requires being named to the U.S. National Team, or a victory in a senior or elite national championship event.

The contribution would have been spent on party favors at the annual banquet, but in lieu of favors, the Crew Team chose to contribute to the Amherst Survival Center. The Survival Center is a non-profit organization that provides emergency food and clothing, information and referrals to those in Amherst and nearby towns.

The UMass community and the families of the Crew are fortunate enough to have young men and women of such character. Their selfless acts of kindness and compassion to those in need in the community are to be applauded.

Disney merchandise: sweatshop produced?

To the editor:

In response to Jason Eiseman's editorial (4/10), I'd like to point out that behind the brightly colored facade of Disney's pro-children and pro-"happiness" imagery lurks something far more wicked than the subversion of folktales: sweatshops. Disney sweatshirts, stuffed animals and assorted paraphernalia are all manufactured under deplorable working conditions by small children in third world countries. According to UNITE (the garment workers union) workers in Disney's sweatshops would have to labor for 156 years to earn what Disney CEO Michael Eisner pays himself in one hour. A most alarming statistic and surely an even better reason to boycott not only Disney movies, but also Disney theme parks and merchandise. Disney represents something that needs to be labelled far more harshly than "not so innocent." I personally prefer "evil."

Roc stays in the old school

"Ain't no party like an Ugli kids party," sorry that track is still stuck in my head, it might have to make the list of butterlicious summer tracks that'll be out next week.

• Forget about the new A Tribe Called Quest album, it's not coming out till the end of the summer.

• Anyone hear De La Soul and Jungle Brothers on the Propellerheads album? I don't know, I'm still not sold on the whole techno and rap thing. Although Jungle Brothers show off some skill by keeping up to one of the fastest tracks ever, makes me kind of miss the Fu-Schnickens.

• There's a British import single featuring Texas and Wu- Tang, produced by the RZA. The track is hot and while Method Man's rhymes are lacking, the combination of him with a great female vocalist has got me open in the same way him and Mary J did.

The tape of the spring is here, and no surprise it's by Roc Raida. Stuck in the Old School, is the name of it and you should buy it or forget about hip hop. This tape is where it's at, strictly old school that proves that Raida is definitely putting in work.

The man has been digging in the crates to find some obscure beats that will have your head nodding and a kool aid smile pasted to your face. What is amazing about this tape is that it lacks those sure fire hits that can save a mix tape, and it still comes off like Anthony Mason in the lane. He mixes in funk, soul, and the Cold Crush brothers and makes you wish you were there when it all started. I'm not going to get into a battle over whose the greatest of all time, and I know a lot of you think it was settled after the X-Men, Invisible Scratch Pickles battle, but I'll leave you with this — I get chills every time I pick up a new Roc Raida tape–he's top billing.

Now, I'd like to show love to you and the underground by letting you all in a little secret called Dujeous? Don't worry, I can't pronounce it either. What I can do is tell you that you need to know about these kids.

Hailing from the Bronx, New York, you know the place that gave birth to hip-hop, this is one of the most creative groups I have ever heard. While the group lacks a DJ, it features drums, guitar, bass, trumpet, and a digeridoo. Dujeous? are like a young Roots, but while the Roots use live instruments to reenact hip-hop beats, these guys go off into some jams. If you combined the coolness of Digable Planets, the live affects of Jazzmatazz, and the creativeness of Jurassic Five, you'd have this group. While the group does show some growing pains, especially evident on the live side, with groups like Black Eyed Peas making some noise there is no reason to keep these cats in the Food for the soul in charismatic film

CITY OF ANGELS
Directed by Brad Silberling with Nicolas Cage, Meg Ryan, Dennis Franz
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Rain pitter-patters the windows as Meg Ryan, alone and yearning, massages her neck and closes her crystal blue eyes. The solemn lyrics of Sarah McLachlan's "Angel" provide the background ballad. And the comforting embrace of Nicolas Cage helps her fall into a magical sleep. It's the most sensual scene in City of Angels, the new ultra-romance that's also an exercise in pleasure, longing, sacrifice and loss. The film uses the word "feel" more times than an episode of "South Park"'s "Jesus and Pals" — and no doubt Trey Parker and Matt Stone would have a field day with a satirization.

If I was in a different mood, I might make fun of City of Angels too. But the film is too charismatic to take with a light heart. It doesn't nearly reach the heartwrenching heights of Titanic, Ghost or any other soul-mate fest, but it does stand tall, literally. Black-coated angels watch and contemplate from atop billboards and traffic lights as city dwellers rush by below them. From the lush sea-scapes to the beautifully cluttered Los Angeles sky-scrapers and highways, City of Angels is food for the soul — Hollywood- fed, of course.

Cage, looking like a cultist in a gushy trance, plays sweet- natured Seth, an angel dedicated to guiding the recently deceased up to heaven. He wants to know what the best thing about life is. "Pajamas," a little girl, watching her family deal with her death, fittingly replies. Humor is too sparse in this mood-soaked melodrama, but when it comes, it's timed perfectly.

Seth and fellow angel Andre Braugher (TV's "Homicide") seem to be content with their ethereal life. Hey, you get to appear and disappear whenever you want. Feel no pain. Hear music at sunset by the beach. Spy on Meg Ryan taking a bath.

Don't worry, females, this isn't the voyeuristic male fantasy that scene might have suggested. This is your film. When Seth visits a departing patient at the city hospital, his eyes lock onto Dr. Maggie Rice (Ryan), and in a truly other- worldly moment, she seems to look right at him, too. Seth is amazed by this. Angels aren't supposed to be seen by humans unless the angel desires it. Desire, though, is exactly what Seth develops for Maggie. He soon makes himself truly visible to her, but finds that his inability to feel her touch, her smell and her presence leaves him aching. Maggie, meanwhile, is fed up with her dull boyfriend and takes to Cage's understanding ways immediately.

Saccharine charm, often too much of it, is abundant as Cage and Ryan stare into each other's eyes while the screen

FOR the EDUCATION and RESEARCH COMMUNITY

For fast relief from the nagging ache of taxes, we recommend TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs are tax-deferred annuities that can help you build additional assets — money that can make the difference between living and living well in retirement.

Contributions to SRAs are conveniently deducted from your salary on a pretax basis. The result? More money invested. Fewer taxes now. And since investment earnings are tax deferred until you receive them as income, the money you don't send to Washington can work even harder for you.

What else do SRAs offer? A full range of investment choices, a helpful loan feature, and the financial expertise of TIAA-CREF, the world's largest retirement system.*

Now More Ways to Meet Your Goals

Today TIAA-CREF can help you meet even more of your financial objectives, with IRAs, mutual funds, and more. We'll help you select the solutions that suit your needs. Visit your benefits office or call us at 1 800 842-2776 to learn more.

play desperately tries to catch up. These early scenes between the two lovers go both north and south. North, because of the star power; south, because Dana Steven's script never knows quite what to do.

For instance, why does Maggie never seem to wonder where Seth comes from? She just seems to accept it when he pops out of nowhere, but later can't handle his secret origin. Furiously, Maggie tries to cut Seth to see if he bleeds, and finds a picture with Seth mysteriously blurred out of it. All of this is done so the two pop-Thespians can cry and fight, then make up with clear lakes and warm fires in the background. This is all fine, except there's no mystery, no suspense. We know exactly what Seth will do when confronted with the idea of becoming human.

City of Angels is based on the classic 1948 Wim Wenders tale Wings of Desire, a treatise on humanity and spirituality that stretched film conventions. Angels instead builds up the love affair, marking like a paperback romance with good acting and a science-fiction spin.

Wings of Desire invoked a poetic atmosphere that City of Angels smartly steals from. Gabriel Yared's tingly piano score is juxtaposed with the peerless photography of John Seale to create a metaphysical tone that is so popular these days, from the music of Madonna to the abundance of angel shows parading our weekend television sets.

And who is more angelic than Meg Ryan? Here, with clever restraint, she plays a more uptight character, one troubled by her profession and place in life. When she mysterioustly loses a patient one day after making no mistakes, she thinks her life is out of her control. Of course, she's partly right. It's a clever move on the movie's part when it stays in character — even when Ryan's dreams come true, she can't get over her need to ride a bike in self- contained bliss.

One of the themes of City of Angels (one that Christianity might have a bit of a problem with, but '90's audiences will eat up) is to enjoy — rather, revel in — the pleasures of life while it lasts. For Seth's friend Nathan Messinger, played with some much-needed spunk by Dennis Franz of "NYPD Blue," those pleasures include a healthy stack of pancakes. For Cage, the pleasure is all Meg. And who can blame him.

Luckily, Cage overcomes his early blandness and fully evidences his serio-comic talents in the movie's surging third act. Those last 40 minutes are somehow the film's best despite their staggering predictability. Cage almost makes up for the entire movie's stumbling along the way.

City of Angels is an odd case, an art-house premise surrounded by a pop-culture exterior. For a director we have Brad Silberling, whose first film effort was Casper, another glossy movie pretending to deal with life and death without ever really doing so. Stay away if this guy ever attempts to remake Bergman or Hitchcock.

But if you have a hopelessly romantic girlfriend, or a gullible boyfriend, don't stay away from City of Angels. When the incredibly mystic new single from Alanis Morisette (returning from on-top-of-world heaven herself) sprawls over the end credits and you leave the theater, don't be surprised if your significant other turns around just to see if there's an angelic being following him/her. It's the spiritual '90's way of conquering loneliness. Of course, this may prompt a huge fight: "Who's more important?! The angel or me?"

I'd say you could make up next to a fireplace and a lake, but that only happens in the movies. Bhaze.

Oh yeah, did I even mention the lyrics, cause they're kind of dope. On "Curiosity," they wonder "Curiosity killed the cat, but who killed rap?" They then contemplate how much better a united hip hop scene would be, instead of one where everyone is beefing over the cheddar on "Currency." The tape was put out by Wax Poetic Productions who write, "Our intent is to promote free expression, offer support for its exposure and further the education of the people." In other words, they're doing what all hip-hop artists should be striving to do. Dujeous? are doing a college tour so check them out if you can.

To help you know what's going on I'm providing you with a list of some of the top mix-tapes they have at the Grow Room in Amherst. Andrew from the Grow Room has been kind enough to provide us with a list, so go pick them up and you can have something to bump in this warm weather.

NFL draft tackles who will be Number 1

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

New York, in April, what is it? it's the National Football League Draft. This year's version takes place on April 18 and 19.

The draft should provide every hard core NFL fan with their fill of action in two days to keep them satisfied until August.

Lets start with the first big debate — who goes No. 1. Should it be Tennessee's quarterback Peyton Manning, or his Washington St. counterpart Ryan Leaf? If history is anything to go by, Manning can only be compared with his predecessor Heath Shuler from Tennessee, while Leaf can be compared with WSU alum Drew Bledsoe.

Paul Teves

The Colts are expected to select Manning. The signal caller has visited Colts management and camp and has been in to see team doctors to clear his previously injured knee. Manning is the money guy, and the Colts have banked on that as Paul Justin is expected to sign with another team, and with last year's starter Jim Harbaugh being traded to the Baltimore Ravens. Meaning that Manning is the do-or-die for the Colts.

How lucky are the San Diego Chargers who own the second pick to open the possibility to choose Leaf? He is a young energetic quarterback with all the skills to perform at the next level. Leaf has a very good chance at being the prize of the draft. Leaf fits nicely in San Diego because former starter Stan Humphries looks ready to call it a career after suffering his sixth concussion last season in a limited amount of time.

By this time next year, the Arizona Cardinals might have won the award for most improved team. Here is why: they have had an incredible off season in the free agent market, and the market has not even begun to heat up. The Cardinals resigned receiver Frank Sanders to a five-year deal. Arizona could have potentially signed a possible free agent steal in Eric Metcalf, and Mario Bates another possible steal at running back.

The move that took the cake was the trade of their 64th overall pick to the New York Jets for Adrian Murrell, who is a 1,000 yard rusher, and a seventh round pick. Finally, they have the third overall, which means that now that their running back needs are filled they can draft the best defensive linemen in the draft, Andre Wadsworth from Florida St.

Who will take the Heisman Trophy Winner — Charles Woodson from Michigan? The Oakland Raiders will with the fourth pick, because Al Davis is in love with this young man's athletic ability.

The Chicago Bears are in a really tough position. They're really not looking for running backs, having just signed Edgar Bennett to a huge deal, and with Curtis Conway still there, they don't need Randy Moss. The Bears are just looking to trade down for a quality player, or several picks, which might be the best thing for this struggling franchise.

After releasing Lawrence Phillips last season, the Rams are looking to draft the pride of a very deep running back core, which is Curtis Enis from Penn St. Enis should spark an already potent group of underachievers.

The hapless and hopeless Saints will make any easy decision which will include drafting Randy Moss from Marshall University. This is the best pick Mike Ditka could make at the spot, and even he can't screw this one up by saying he is in search of better defense.

Lets talk some of the first round pluses. Vonnie Holliday, who was the leader of the incredible North Carolina defense, could be a huge addition to either the Cowboy's roster or Jacksonville's, but Jaguars are looking to trade up for Wadsworth.

The Carolina Panthers need to work on both of their lines, but they did that when they went out and signed Sean Gilbert away from the Washington Redskins. They will probably look for more line help later in the draft. The Redskins in turn for their loss will get Carolina's 14th pick where they will either select Grant Wirnstrom, DE from Nebraska if he slips, but will probably draft Greg Ellis, a defensive end from North Carolina.

The New England Patriots have an excellent situation for this years draft. The Pats have their own three picks in the first three rounds, they receive the Jets second round pick this year for Bill Parcells leaving and the Jets first and third round picks this year in compensation for Curtis Martin who signed a six-year $36 million deal with the Jets. The Patriots have 6 of the top 82 picks in a very deep draft.

Coach Carroll's team might want to begin in the first round with either Fred Taylor, the running back from Florida, or Robert Edwards the back out of Georgia. This is the plan if negotiations break down with the Bears for the fifth pick overall. If the Pats keep their 22nd pick, they are likely to select Tebucky Jones, a defensive back who really has all the skills.

Various team owners around the league compare the Patriots situation this year to that of the Dallas Cowboys when they received all those picks for Herschel Walker. The major difference is the Patriots already are contenders where the Cowboys were a 1-15 team.

Who will help the contenders? The Bucs, who have now become contenders under Tony Dungy, will likely select more help for Dilfer in the form of Kevin Dyson, a talented wide receiver from Utah. Look for the Chiefs to take a gamble on Ahman Green, the running back from Nebraska. Green will try to fill the shoes of retired veteran Marcus Allen.

Green Bay will try to stop the bleeding caused by free agency with probably an all defensive draft. Look for the Pack to select outside linebacker Leonard Little from Tennessee in the first round and select the best available defensive end, and corner back in the second and third rounds.

The Broncos will probably get help at wide receiver, in the form of Pat Johnson out of Oregon. They love this kid's speed.

The major sleeper to watch out for is Chris Conrad, an offensive tackle from Fresno State who will likely be selected early in the second round. Another notable is Joe Jurevicius, a talented WR from Penn St. who is a third round possibility for the Oilers, Bengals, or Lions. Also on the list is Tavian Banks, a questionable pick in the second round but a steal in the third for either the Bucs, or maybe the Pats who are in need of runners.

Finally, Scott Frost who will probably be a third round selection for the Niners who hope to convert him from quarterback to safety.

Expect the Dolphins to take a risk on Gator's WR, Jacquez Green, who just might become the type of franchise player they need.

No matter how the draft finishes or where the players fall, this is one of the deepest drafts in recent history. Sorry Parcells I guess you blew it again.

Controversy sprouts over Knicks' loss

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The New York Knicks filed a protest today over their controversial loss at Miami, bringing up a new argument — a red light malfunction that might have caused a referee to wave off Allan Houston's last-second shot.

Replays showed that Houston released his shot with 0.2 seconds remaining Sunday in Miami's 82-81 victory.

Referee Bob Delaney emphatically waved it off, and the officials huddled at center court before upholding their decision.

The loss knocked the Knicks into eighth place in the Eastern Conference.

The Knicks' protest consisted of a letter, a videotape and a check for $1,500 — the official fee for filing a protest.

They argued that an electronic malfunction — the red light behind their basket illuminating with 0.1 seconds remaining — could have caused Delaney to wave off the shot.

"If they do the right thing, we'll have another win," Knicks coach Jeff Van Gundy said today. "I don't expect them to do the right thing in this case."

By claiming a technical malfunction, it appeared the Knicks were trying to get around the NBA rule that states: "Regardless of when the horn or red light operates to signify the end of a period, the officials ultimately make the final decision whether to allow or disallow a successful field goal."

League spokesman Brian McIntyre said the NBA would have no comment until the Knicks' protest was reviewed.

O'Meara victorious in Masters

By Ron Sirak
Associated Press

AUGUSTA, Ga. — Pride is an important part of the complex makeup of Mark O'Meara, a gentle man who nevertheless gets a glimmer of determination in his eyes if he feels he's being ignored.

Nowhere was that pride more evident than when he stood tall on the 18th green at Augusta National Golf Club on Sunday with his arms raised after his 20-foot winning putt in the Masters completed a finish of three birdies in four holes.

Nowhere was the pride of the new Masters champion tested more severely than 14 months ago when O'Meara won at Pebble Beach and Torrey Pines on consecutive weeks. But the second win came on the same day Tiger Woods was winning in Thailand against a weak field. Still, it was the victory half a world away by Woods that received all the attention — sucking the air out of Tigermania at the time.

O'Meara and Woods are both represented by International Management Group and the super agency has encouraged their friendship, hoping the 41-year-old O'Meara could teach the 22-year-old Woods a thing or two.

That friendship has blossomed because of a genuine affection, but that had not stopped O'Meara from bristling when he felt the golf world was spending too much time talking about Woods and not fully appreciating other players.

"I would hope not," O'Meara said when asked about the possibility of a Woods-only focus among golf fans. "I think that would be very bad for the game."

O'Meara, who lives near Woods in Orlando, Fla., knows what his neighbor has brought to golf, but offers a word of caution. "He has been a blessing for the game," O'Meara said. "But I would hope that the people he brings to the game can appreciate the game of golf."

Woods' talent, his early success on tour and the at times unreasonable expectations for his future by the public have charged the competitive juices of a slew of young players like David Duval, the runner-up at the Masters, Jim Furyk, who finished fourth, and Justin Leonard, who was eighth.

But Woods has also rekindled the competitive fire in some players who've been around awhile, like Fred Couples, who tied Duval for second, and perhaps even 58-year old Jack Nicklaus, who tied for sixth.

Certainly it is true in the case of O'Meara.

"I love competition," he said. "I love feeling that little bit of tingling going on inside. When you have a guy like Tiger Woods coming on and the yelling, it's the best."

By every yardstick but one — winning a major championship — O'Meara has had a very successful career. After Sunday, he had 15 PGA Tour victories, six more wins overseas and with more than $9 million was fourth on the career PGA Tour money list.

finish line, going 4-6 in their last ten games, giving outsiders Washington and Orlando a distant shot. Now is the time, if any, that the Knicks should be playing their best. Patrick Ewing has stated that he wants to be back for the playoffs, so he can give it one last shot, before New York gets yet another year older. Hey, if John Starks doesn't go 3 for 21 in Game Seven vs. the Rockets, maybe Ewing would be home resting his knees.

Despite having a better record without Ewing, the Knicks could use Ewing in the middle instead of forcing Charles Oakley and Terry Cummings into the middle. An NBA championship this year for MSG's finest would stun the world, but not entirely out of the question, especially with Ewing back.

Well, yeah it is, but listen for a moment. Everybody in the Big Apple obviously wants to draw the Heat in the first round. The Bulls are automatic see-ya-laters in the first frame, sweeping the eight seeds in their last three campaigns as the top seed in the East. Well, as for the Heat, the Knicks beat Miami both at home AND on the road (tough call at full speed, but God knows Ailan Houston beat that clock). So a first round dousing could and would happen.

Next on tap for the Knicks would be Indiana or Cleveland, and with a little luck and great interior defense they would knock off either. The Knicks are just too deep and close-knit in the paint for either. Let Wesley Person and Mark Jackson beat you from deep. It just isn't going to happen.

By that time, perhaps, the Bulls could be dislodged. Sure, chances are slim, but the Bulls' possible second round opponent, Charlotte, has the second best home record in the East behind Chicago.

There lies a lot of parity in the Western Conference. Last year, the Clippers earned a ticket to the playoffs. The feat, amazing in itself, but more amazing because they only posted 36 wins on the season. This year, although Houston is huffing and puffing, the West will be well deservedly won, whoever is left standing.

A late surge by Phoenix has put the heat on San Antonio, especially with David Robinson still woozy from a Karl Malone elbow. A Phoenix/San Antonio first round clash will create a very interesting variance in abilities. Coach Danny Ainge has implemented a three guard offense in Phoenix, and an undersized frontcourt, with former Trail Blazer and small forward Cliff Robinson in the middle (sorry Hot Rod). San Antonio counters with the biggest frontcourt in basketball in Robinson, Rookie of the Year Tim Duncan (call it a stab), and workhorse Will Perdue. Tempo will be the key.

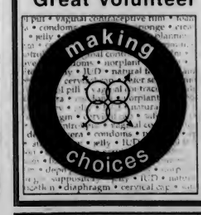
UMass will play their first game on Friday night, two games on Saturday and one on Sunday. Their toughest competitor will be Harvard who they have beaten twice this season by an average margin of 11.5 goals. Meanwhile, Nieves has averaged ten saves per game the Crimson.



"We just need to stay focused and keep what we have been doing in practice in mind and execute as well as play together as a team, and we should be able continue on our way to our goals," said McOsker.

Minutemen power over Hartford, 6–3

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Yesterday afternoon's matinee between Massachusetts and Hartford at Earl Lorden Field could be properly deemed a microcosm of the season for the Minutemen.

It seems like every game a different player emerges to lead UMass to victory, and yesterday's contest was no different.

Trailing 2–1 in the sixth inning, senior right fielder Pete Gautreau belted a two–run homer over the right center field fence. The Minutemen would not relinquish their lead, and pulled away for a 6–3 victory over the visiting Hawks.

Massachusetts	6
Hartford	3

"I was just trying to hit it hard, and I got under it a little bit. But I won't take it back," Gautreau said. "The lineup is just full of real good hitters. Everybody is capable of getting the big hit, and it's good that it works out that way."

However, Gautreau wasn't the only one who stepped things up against Hartford. Junior pitcher Rich Hartman came in and threw five shutout innings to earn his second win of the season.

"He [Hartman] gave us some quality innings his last time out against Central Connecticut and again today," Massachusetts coach Mike Stone said. "Right now it looks like he's the next guy [in the rotation]. It was nice to see him pitch well."

Hartford jumped out to a 2–0 lead off starter Scott Barnsby, who was making his first appearance since March 16 because of tendinitis. The Minutemen cut the lead in half in the bottom of the third. Senior Matt Wolcott doubled to lead off the inning, moved to third on a ground out by junior Seth Kaplan, and scored on a double by sophomore Shaun Skeffington.

Hartman entered in the fourth after Barnsby had reached his pitch limit. With UMass still trailing in their half of the sixth, senior Muchie Dagliere laid down a bunt single to extend his hitting streak to 24 games. Then, with two outs, Gautreau sent a Robert Field offering over the 370–foot sign to put the Minutemen ahead for good.

UMass (17–8, 8–1 Atlantic 10) tacked on another run later in the inning. Junior Brian Samela doubled down the right field line, and scored on a single by junior Aaron Braunstein to increase the lead to 4–2.

"We made things so tough on ourselves because we were either getting picked off or making mental mistakes by swinging at bad pitches after six balls in a row, or not holding runners when we're supposed to," Stone said. "This is all not good. We're a better team than that."

Gautreau would later tack on another RBI after getting hit by a pitch with the bases loaded in the seventh. Skeffington also drove in his second run of the game with an RBI single in the eighth. Hartford's Earl Synder rounded out the scoring with a solo homer in the ninth. But it proved too little, too late for the Hawks as the Minutemen secured another victory.

The Minutemen also took two out of three from Temple over the weekend. UMass split a doubleheader on Friday, winning game one 7–2, but falling 5–3 in game two against the Owls. The left–hander, Bill Cooke, tossed another complete game with eight strikeouts to move to 5–1 on the season in the victory.

UMass then pulled out an 8–7 win in 11 innings on Saturday afternoon, as Braunstein had a two–out single which scored Samela and gave UMass the win. The sophomore southpaw, Travis Veracka, pitched six and two– thirds innings in relief to earn his third win of the season.

"We were lucky to get two of three out of the weekend," Stone said. "We struggled and we're playing down to the level of our opponents."

Yesterday's victory provides a tremendous confidence boost for the Minutemen as they had been struggling to find stability in their pitching, especially in their weekday rotation.

UMass will next hit the diamond Thursday at 3 p.m. when the Minutemen travel to Boston to face Northeastern. Next week marks the return of the Beanpot held at Fenway Park on April 21 and 23. Massachusetts will face Northeastern, Harvard, and Boston College in the two–day affair. In between, the Minutemen will travel north to oppose the Black Bears of Maine on April 22.

Bulls last dance? Ewing wants in on Finals action

Brett Mauser

My father told me that I should go abroad and cover sports. He said I could cover Australian Rules Football, soccer, cricket, bullfighting, and the Running of the Bulls. Going by my sweet BC average in Spanish these days, I figured sticking around the homestead would be a better idea. After all, why travel around the world when you can capture the Running of the Bulls in the comfort of your own dorm?

The Bulls are going with a full head of steam these days, and with the playoffs coming up. Right now, only an equally gigantic Pacer or Hornet or Laker is going to need to step in the way like a catcher would in baseball. But looking at the competition, literally or figuratively, ChiTown should be arranging another one of them parades come June.

While Reggie Jackson is Mr. October, Michael Jordan, fittingly, is Mr. June. The postseason is his playground, his domain. It could be another juicy campaign for the former Tarheel, possibly challenging the Knicks in the first round for possibly the last time in his glorious career.

Either way, the Knicks will be in a dogfight in the first round. The Heat could come calling as well. In the last two weeks, the Heat and Knicks have tangled for two nailbiters. The NBA, with His Airness leaving (or so he said), could use a March Madness–like finale of the season.

Women's lax trample St. Joes, 10–2

It was the best of times, it was the worst of times. It was a tale of two halves when the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team took the field at St. Joseph's on Saturday afternoon, winning 10–2.

In the first half, the Minutewomen buried the ill–prepared Hawks by scoring nine goals and allowing only one. Starting UMass goaltender Tara Durkin saw a mere six shots, although the opposition spent considerable time putting offensive pressure on.

Massachusetts	10
Hartford	2

Attacks Laura Korutz and Fay Naber produced four points apiece, and seniors Jen Bowen and Jen Herker got on the board as well. Overall, seven Massachusetts players got in on the action offensively.

In the second half, however, St. Joe's matched UMass with a somatic score of 1–1.

Goalie Jen Nardi started the second period for the Minutewomen, and made five saves of her own. What bothered coach Francesca McClellan was the inconsistency.

"The real story here is that nobody scored in the last 23 minutes of the game," McClellan said.

In the first half, they spent way too much time in our end of the field.

Our defense played way too casual. In the second half, we strengthened that up a bit, but we couldn't finish on the offensive end. We need to work on putting together 60 good minutes."

On Thursday, the Minutewomen will host Hofstra at Totman field at 4 p.m.

Men's track claims win in weekend quad–meet

BRIAN MCDERMOTT \ COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts men's track and field team crushed their opponents on Saturday as they hosted Iona, Providence, and Holy Cross.

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's track team continue their successful spring season with a win this past weekend to improve to 4–0. Towering over their competition, they amounted a score total of 123 points as they claimed first in 14 of the 19 events. The Minutemen hosted Holy Cross (59), Iona (24), and Providence (11) at Llewelyn Derby Track on Saturday.

The field events continue to enjoy improved success with another record shattering performance — this time in the pole event — as junior Albie Vazquez set a UMass record with an even 15'0" leap, beating his own clear of 14'9" last year.

Sophomore Vic Morency also put forth a stellar effort, capturing first in two events with a 6' hammer throw of 172'4" and a javelin heave of 191'6". Junior B.J. Cardoza won the 5'75 hammer throw with a distance of 185'7". UMass also reigned in the long jump as freshman Kyle Kinter won in a length of 20'11". Other Minutemen notables in the field include junior Ian Stevens' win in the shot put with a toss of 50'6", best in the Atlantic 10 this spring. Senior Brandon Tutt's victory in the triple jump (42'11").

The Minutemen runners held up their end of the bargain, as they were not outdone by their field counterparts. Junior Ben Baraldi raced to first place in the 110 meters hurdles in a time of 14.8 seconds while junior Tom Toye won first place in the 400m (48.6).

The Minutemen controlled the 400m intermediate hurdles as junior Neil Concepcion captured first in a time of 53.8. Dave Cahil followed closely with a time of 55.34. Both scores rank first and second for laps in the A–10 this spring. Senior Scott Price continued the gravy train with a first place finish in the 200m (22.1).

The Minutemen completed their successful meet with victories in the 4x100m, and 4x400m relay teams.

UMass returns to the track with another quad–meet at Northeastern on April 18. The Ivy League's Dartmouth will be represented along with the A–10's Rhode Island. After that, the Minutemen head to Philadelphia for the famed Penn Relays from April 23 through the 25th.

Women's water polo beats Crimson 6–2

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's water polo team closed out the regular season on Saturday with a victory over Harvard University, 16–2.

The win closes out the Minutewomen's regular season with a 21–3 record overall, 8–0 in league play and 1–0 at home. They disposed of Harvard as they have done in past meetings with eastern opponents.

The contest was over before it began. Marcie Hupp scored five goals leading the offense, while goalie Peggy Nieves made 11 saves.

"We played really well, accomplished what we've been working on in practice, which is excellent. This victory keeps everything up beat heading into the New England Championships," said Coach Dan McOsker.

Other offense contributors for UMass include Andrea Vazquez who punched in three goals, Barbara Hickey who scored two, and Katie Grogan who also netted two, to bring her season total to 68, which leads the team.

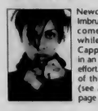
Other point scorers included Katie Mayer, Lyndsay Crenshaw and Laurie Edwards who all chipped in with one goal each.

"As of right now every thing is right where we want it to be heading into New England's, and because everyone has gotten comfortable playing as a team so the offense is clicking the way I wanted it to," said McOsker.

How is the defense? Strong as usual, Peggy is averaging 1.42 goals against in net, which is outstanding. She is also receiving stellar support from the other players who are working hard on the defense, which is the mainstay of the team this season.

"The defense has been our steady. It's worked for us all season, and now we just hope that it carries over into New Englands," said McOsker.

What's next for UMass, who has gone 15–0 on the east coast? They head to the New England Championships, In Middletown, Conn., where they will battle more of the same competition.



The New England's will determine where the Minutewomen will be seeded heading into the Eastern's which is in two weeks.

U.S. envoy discusses security with India

NEW DELHI, India (AP) — India and the United States discussed security concerns yesterday during the first high–level U.S. visit since a new government took over in India.

"I will not reveal what we have discussed, but the talks were focused on all the issues necessary from a security point of view," Defense Minister George Fernandes told reporters after meeting with Bill Richardson, the U.N. ambassador to the United Nations.

Fernandes took office March 19 as part of a new 20–party governing coalition led by the Hindu–nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party.

One issue likely on Richardson's agenda was recent BJP pledges to induct nuclear weapons. The United States, long critical of India's refusal to sign international nuclear nonproliferation agreements, maintains the BJP stance does not represent a new direction for India.

Fernandes told reporters said the final decision on whether to go nuclear would be made by a National Security Council that his party has pledged to establish. That made it clear no changes will be made soon.

Post offices try to make taxes fun

WASHINGTON (AP) — Last–minute tax filers in Pleasanton, Calif., might not be able to drown their sorrows at the post office tonight, but they can pretend to drown the tax man in a dunking booth set up near the mail boxes.

Other post offices around the country are also offering ways to cope with the final hours of the tax season, from back rubs for the overstressed in Boise, Idaho, to blues bands in Arlington, Va., for those who just want to whine and moan.

"It's a way we can get together and make it a little less taxing for them," said Beth Barnett, spokeswoman for the Memphis, Tenn., post office, where taxpayers can blow off steam by bashing a Buick with a sledgehammer.

Tax forms must be postmarked by midnight today, and many post offices expect long lines as procrastinators send an estimated 44 million pieces of mail. Many post offices will stay open late and offer some amenities, such as curbside pickup of tax forms or free coffee.

IRS agents will be on hand at a number of post offices to answer questions, but the line will no doubt be longest in Pleasanton, where IRS volunteers will take a seat in the dunking booth. There's no dunking booth in Boise, but the post office and local broadcast stations will offer just about everything else. In addition to tax help and free massages, late filers will be serenaded by a quintet from the Boise Philharmonic and can listen to Sen. Larry Craig, an Idaho Republican, talk about the need for tax reform.

Student judiciary nullifies elections

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

The student judiciary nullified elections for the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) president and student trustee late Monday night and set dates for new elections.

The judiciary nullified the elections after finding several election procedures unconstitutional in a petition brought before it.

In a unanimously signed Majority Ruling the judiciary outlined the reasoning behind their decision.

The judiciary found the lack of absentee ballots and adequate staffing at the polling places were harmful errors that denied students the right to vote.

"Five or six polling stations, on both election days, failed to provide absentee ballots whatsoever," the Majority Ruling stated. "This 'harmful error' could have substantially affected the outcome of the election."

"Polling places were staffed by only one person, rather than the prescribed two people," the Majority Ruling stated. "The judiciary deems this a harmful error because of its significant implications."

Chief Justice LaToya Simms could not be reached for comment on the decision.

Attorney General Jesse Burchfield, who proposed the petition that caused the nullification of the elections, was happy about the judiciary's decision.

"I'm psyched," Burchfield said. "The judiciary had a hard decision to make and they came to the only proper action," Burchfield said.

Senator Brenda Fitzpatrick (Commuter, At–Large), who also proposed the petition, was pleased with the decision.

"I'm glad that the judiciary came to a decision," Fitzpatrick said.

Senator Eleanor Court (Asian, Latino, African, Native American Caucus) who had been elected student trustee was in support of the nullification.

"I'm happy because I feel it's the SGA's chance to save face with the students," Court said.

Court said she will run again in the new elections.

"I'm looking forward to running again. I'd rather work twice as hard to get elected again than be sworn in right now," Court said.

Amy Pellegrino could not be reached for comment.

Until new elections can be held, the speaker of the senate, Peter Kilbourne, will be the acting president.

Kilbourne felt the elections were too flawed to be ratified.

"Too many things have happened in the elections that we can't say have or have not affected the outcome of the elections," Kilbourne said.

There was concern that nullifying these elections set a precedent that would enable future elections to be easily nullified.

"It creates a loophole for candidates that lose in the future," Senator Jefferey Howe (Orchard Hill, Dickinson) said. "The precedent that has been set is that every future election will have to be run specifically by the constitution, and the way the constitution is written that is impossible."

New elections will be held April 29 and 30. The judiciary mandated new election dates in order to hold elections this semester.

Kilbourne is in support of the new elections.

"It's the best thing for the SGA to finally be able to redo these elections in a just manner," he said.

Candidates for the new elections will be the same candidates as in the first elections, including candidates who were dismissed from the race.

"Everyone who turned in valid nomination papers which includes Cassasanto, Hansen and Parker, are back in the race. No new people can join the race," Kilbourne said. Campaigning begins when an elections chancellor is elected.

"The judiciary mandated it will have an elections commission internal vote for elections chancellor that the judiciary will run," Kilbourne said. "I will try to call them [the election commission] tonight and get them together. Minimum time [when the election commission will vote] is a couple of hours. Maximum is a couple of days."

Bulger announces Gen Ed task force

ALEXANDER KOROMILAS / COLLEGIAN

UMass President William Bulger in the School of Management yesterday afternoon.

By Victoria Groves

University of Massachusetts President William M. Bulger visited the Amherst campus yesterday at a special meeting of the Faculty Senate.

Speaking for about 10 minutes before members of the senate, faculty, administration, Graduate Student Organization (GEO) and Student Government Association (SGA), Bulger congratulated the faculty and announced plans for a new general education task force.

"The administration of Amherst should be congratulated for many things. I'm pleased that there is a task force on campus seeking to reform general education requirements for undergraduates. The world is changing," Bulger said.

Recently, Bulger has attended many Massachusetts public high schools to encourage students to consider the UMass system as a place to continue their education.

"Visiting high school campuses keeps me in touch and I can get an idea of what the perception of us is.

"The thing you hear most from students is that they don't have a lot of money. We've kept tuition and fees down over the last three years," Bulger said.

A new advertisement to be broadcast all over the state was also presented to the senate.

Past alumni, such as comedian Bill Cosby, CEO of General Electric John Welch and astronaut Catherine Coleman appear in the advertisement as does Bulger, asking graduating high school seniors to "Let us be part of your success story." Television advertisements for the University have never been broadcast before.

Bulger urged the faculty to focus on issues such as the fee freeze, in which the University has been successful.

Some senators were concerned that the Amherst campus has been viewed negatively despite what many see as various steps in the right direction.

"We are criticized a lot. There's a big difference between excellence and perfection. Our critics are looking for perfection," Professor Edward Connors, of the mathematics and statistics department, said.

"We have problems but we all should be proud of what is happening here," he said

"Most of our alumni remain in Massachusetts. We're serving the constituency very well. In many areas this University has been essential," Bulger said.

Web to get new data pipeline

Experts unsure how faster, more reliable Internet will be used

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The next generation of the Internet, so fast that even top experts aren't sure exactly how it might be used, got a boost yesterday from three companies that will contribute an ultra–fast data pipeline and some of the needed network equipment.

"We will end the days when the World Wide Web is known by some as the world wide wait," said Vice President Al Gore, who announced the contributions worth more than $500 million.

The new network's direct benefits will be restricted largely to academics and other professional researchers. There's no way — and none planned — to let home users dial into the network.

How fast is fast?

Organizers said it will transmit the contents of the 30–volume Encyclopedia Brittanica in one second. It would take about 27 hours to transmit that much over a conventional 28.8–kilobit modem. In the project's earliest stages, organizers hope to connect at least 100 universities about 100 times faster than current connections allow and a smaller group of schools at speeds 1,000 times faster.

"That's a startling advance, and it will make a huge difference," Gore said.

Qwest Communicaitions International offered use of its high–speed fiber–optic network, which runs from Los Angeles to New York. The administration put the market value of Qwest's offer at $500 million over three years. The other two companies, Cisco Systems and Northern Telecom, are offering network equipment, such as routers and switches.

Qwest said its contribution amounted to 1/364 of the capacity on its new transcontinental line.

"We're talking about applications that actually change the unit of measure we're used to dealing with," said Joseph Nacchio, chief executive officer for Qwest. He said the speeds will make obsolete references to kilobits and megabits per second, and he only half–heartedly suggested a new concept: LOCs per second, or the number of times the contents of the Library of Congress can be transmitted each second.

Those new speeds — plus other enhancements, such as better reliability and a way to prioritize critical data so it arrives earlier — will let programmers develop applications not yet imagined, experts said. Early possibilities include better tornado forecasting, long–distance learning or allowing a specialist in another city to look at real–time images of a beating heart and make a diagnosis.

"You can say videoconferencing, telemedicine — but when you start getting the whole entrepreneurial community working on it, it goes through enormous paces," Nacchio said.

Added Gore: "We will unleash breakthroughs that will power American industry for years to come."

The companies will benefit by getting to work with top researchers.

"We can be on the cutting edge of research by universities, and it gives us relationship with the universities to sell other services," Nacchio said. And it will get Qwest's name known. "The brand value of that alone is going to be worth a lot of money." Companies said they planned to treat the project as a research platform, although technology breakthroughs are widely expected to filter down to consumers, typically 12 to 18 months after they're first introduced.

"One can imagine that some of the public networks will have some of these facilities built into them within a year or two," said Vint Cerf, a senior vice president for MCI Communications Corp. The company has provided access for the project to the so–called Very High Performance Backbone Network Service under an agreement with the National Science Foundation.

Additionally, companies can claim a tax deduction for some types of research and development expenses.

Bulger speaks to GEO about unresolved issues

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts President William Bulger met with members of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) yesterday to discuss issues surrounding the implementation of wage increases and retroactive pay.

GEO leaders asked Bulger to meet with them after a Campus Chronicle article reported that Bulger had sent the contract to Massachusetts Governor Paul Celucci, forcing a three– to four–week delay of wage increases for graduate employees.

Jennifer Fasulo, GEO Vice–President, said GEO was worried that graduates who were leaving after this year would not get retroactive pay if approval of the contract was put off until the end of the semester.

Fasulo was also concerned because there have been no assurances about when the pay increases would be implemented.

"[Bulger] thanked us for alerting him to the situation," Fasulo said. "He didn't seem to know that much about what was really going on."

GEO President Mahmoot Ketabchi said Vice Chancellor Sue Pearson assured GEO yesterday that the contract would be approved by Friday, if not earlier. The wage increases would be in place the week after, and retroactive pay would be paid the following week.

Fasulo said confusion continues to linger about when the contract will be approved and the pay increases implemented.

"People are really counting or relying on this money," Fasulo said. "Sue Pearson, at no time, explained to us that this process was going to happen."

Fasulo said Pearson had assured GEO that every person who was a graduate employee as of March 26 would get wage increases and retroactive pay.

Pearson was unavailable for comment.

In March, the contract which had been agreed upon by GEO and the administration was ratified by GEO membership. Approval of the contract by President Bulger is now required to make the changes which were outlined.

The contract agreement ended two years of negotiations between GEO and the administration. A mediator led the two sides to an agreement on issues which had been disputed such as child care, diversity and wage increases.

In less than a year, GEO and the administration will have to return to the bargaining table.

"CANstruction" Competition to support local hunger issues

By Jason Trankle
Collegian Staff

Imagine constructing the Statue of Liberty entirely out of cans of Campbell's tomato soup? Eight western Massachusetts architects will put their design skills to test, as they compete to construct a structural design using canned beans and soup instead of bricks and mortars.

The first annual "CANstruction Competition" will begin Sunday, April 19 at the Holyoke Mall and continue throughout the week of April 20 in support of hunger issues. These architects, representing the American Institute of Architects, will display their creative talents by constructing an artistic structural design out of canned food products, as an innovative way of raising food for people in need and raising public awareness of local hunger issues. The local participating architectural firms include Ray Kinoshita Studio of Amherst and Design students from the University of Massachusetts and Springfield College.

The canned and packaged food involved in the displays of the competition will be distributed to emergency food pantries throughout western Massachusetts. Various orgnizations and companies are contributing to the canned food supply and include the local A&P/Foodmart, Stop & Shop, C&S Wholesale Grocers, Seder Foods and T&R Foods. Other sponsors of the "CANstruction" event include Rachel's Table of the Jewish Federation of Greater Springfield.

UMass alumnus Pamela Finer initiated the idea for organizing the benefit competition. As Finer described, she thought of the idea to start a local food "CANstruction" project as a result of the annual nationwide competition in New York.

"The issue of hunger is a yearly issue that affects us all in one way or another, and the process to stop hunger is an on- going process," Finer said.

The architects' creativity will be tested as they compete for awards such as "Best Meal," "Best Use of Labels" and "Structural Ingenuity." The public is invited to attend and to vote for their favorite display for "Peoples' Choice Award." An official ballot can be cast in exchange for every donated canned food item brought to the mall during the week of April 20.

The "CANstruction" competition has been a cooperative project effort between local businesses and social outreach.

"This is the first time in Western Massachusetts that such a project has been initiated, and as it has been successful nationally in the past," Finer said. "We hope to make it an annual event to address the problems of hunger."

The winner will be awarded at the gala "CANstruction" Awards Ceremony at the Holyoke Mall on Sunday, April 26 at 5 p.m. All are welcome to attend.

Flood doesn't stop paper from work or Pulitzer

By John MacDonald
Associated Press

FARGO N.D. — Its building and newspaper press were a pile of smoking rubble in a pool of brown muck. The homes of reporters, editors and photographers were under water as well. Still, the Grand Forks Herald never missed a day of publication.

The newspaper won the Pulitzer Prize for public service yesterday for its work in covering the flood and fire that devastated the North Dakota community and the paper's own newsroom a year ago this week. Its banner headline two days after the fire seemed to say it all: "Come hell and high water."

It was the first Pulitzer for the Herald, which has a daily circulation of 37,000.

"We're walking on air," publisher Mike Maidenberg said. "It's just a wonderful feeling for us to be recognized for what we did."

Editor Mike Jacobs, who was doused with champagne by a fellow staffer as he was interviewed, said the award brought recognition to a staff that overcame impossible odds.

"It's an important tribute to what this newspaper staff was able to do under tremendous stress," said Jacobs, whose home was damaged by floodwaters.

The Herald's main building had been swamped by the Red River when a fire broke out in downtown Grand Forks on April 19, 1997. With four feet of water in the streets, firefighters were helpless as flames destroyed several blocks, including the Herald building that contained its newsroom, press, nearly all its computer equipment and its extensive library.

Staff members quickly regrouped and had a newspaper out the next day, distributed free to flood victims.

They borrowed space at the University of North Dakota — one of the few areas not completely under water. The St. Paul Pioneer Press, a fellow Knight Ridder newspaper more than 300 miles away in Minnesota, printed the Herald pages.

"I think the greatest service that the Herald did was being able to put a paper out at all," said Jacobs, noting that nearly all of the 57 newsroom employees suffered their own losses in the flood.

Deal possible in postponed apartheid trial

By Paul Harris
Associated Press

GEORGE, South Africa — The trial to determine whether P.W. Botha snubbed the Truth and Reconciliation Commission was postponed yesterday as the former president's lawyers labored to cut a deal and avoid prosecution.

The case symbolizes South Africa's lingering racial tensions, pitting Botha — the last hard-line apartheid leader — against President Nelson Mandela's 1995 commission set up to uncover crimes and promote reconciliation.

Rather than facing a black judge on charges he willingly ignored subpoenas to testify before a commission probing apartheid-era atrocities, Botha hopes to negotiate a deal that would drop all charges in return for his testimony.

Prosecutors set a deadline for this morning for Botha's lawyers and commission officials to hammer out a deal. Otherwise, they said, the trial would proceed.

"it appears at this late stage, that although the parties are very close to an agreement, such an agreement has not yet been struck," state prosecutor Bruce Morrison said yesterday. "Unless the parties come to some definite agreement by 8 o'clock [this] morning, this matter will proceed."

Conservative whites have rallied around Botha, who says the Truth Commission is a witch hunt against apartheid leaders and security forces.

Blacks, on the other hand, see Botha standing before magistrate Judge Victor Lugaju, who is black, as a sign of real change after the nation's first all-race election in 1994 ended apartheid. By entering into negotiations with the Truth Commission, Botha has signaled he might testify in person before the panel — something he previously said he would never do.

The commission wants Botha to answer questions about the State Security Council he headed during the 1980s.

Botha contends commission chairman Desmond Tutu verbally agreed he could supply written answers to questions instead of having to appear in person. He has already submitted more than 1,700 pages of information to the panel.

The Truth Commission, however, wants Botha to appear in person to assert its credibility with the black majority. Many blacks are angry that former apartheid leaders like Botha have avoided testimony, while popular black leaders such as Winnie Madikizela-Mandela have had lengthy public hearings.

The waiting game

There's this song by Carly Simon called "Anticipation" and the first part goes something like "Anticipation is making me..."

I'm trying to figure out what the last word in that sentence is, but somehow the thesaurus of possibilities isn't working out so well and my colleagues down here at the Collegian aren't raving Carly Simon fans either, so we're going to have to go with the fill-in-the-blank type mentality.

The first suggestion is "crazy," followed by "ill" and, lastly, "giddy." In my current, flustered state-of-mind, I vote for all of the above.

Seema Gangatirkar

You see, I've been waiting for this phone call since last Thursday, a phone call which could potentially change my life for, like, evah. So you can see, my entire life revolves around the phone.

Now, most of you would immediately stamp a big "L" on my forehead because I'm so completely wrapped up in whether the phone will ring today or tomorrow. But y'all know the feeling of checking your voice mail every 32 seconds (just in case you missed that vital message by seconds) or logging on to e-mail to see if the news you've been waiting for has finally made its way over the exceedingly slow Internet (by the way, anything is slow when you are in a state of anticipation).

Living in a state of anticipation means that you are existing between two polar opposites, meaning you are swinging from euphoria to ennui. Right now I'm euphoric, which means everything and anything is funny; in a few minutes, I could be suffering from a case of ennui, in which case I will be huddled in a ball in some dusty little corner, contemplating the metaphysical aspects of life.

Anticipation leads to fantasizing of the most ridiculous proportions. At this point, I'm immediately planning out the rest of my life, based on this one phone call which I haven't received yet. But as time progresses, I'll continue to plan and eventually build up this enormous thing that kind of rides along on my shoulders, so I'm constantly thinking about this phone call.

By the end of this past weekend, I had constructed elaborate plans on what would happen once this phone call came through. While my parents would be pleasantly proud of my foresight and thorough planning, there is a major obstacle in the way — that's the fact that my fantasized life depends on the good victsitudes of Ma Bell.

My anticipation is starting to evolve into an obsession, as I spend countless hours watching my phone, thinking about how I'm going to answer that phone, what I'm going to say, how I will respond if only, dammit, that phone would ring.

I have even developed this top 10 list of why the phone hasn't rung. Number 10 was that they lost my phone number, number nine was the fact that it was Good Friday and no one calls anyone on Good Friday.

I'm slowly working my way down to number three which is they are still checking my references. As you can see, anticipation is slowly driving me into insanity.

Anticipation-induced insanity has a variety of symptoms, including sweaty palms, elevated heartbeat and general obsessing. And don't ignore the butterflies which are moving lock, stock and barrel right into the pit of your stomach. Add a distracted mental state of mind and you can see that I'm half-way to an anxiety attack.

Keep in mind there are several different types of anticipation, so symptoms may vary on a case by case basis.

For example, there's the anticipation that comes whenever you get handed back something in class. There's the panicked "Oh my God, I got number three wrong! Is there a curve? Does spelling count?" type reaction. And once you get your paper back, it's all good (or bad), but immediately all the worse case scenarios are out of your head.

Then there is the bad news anticipation. An example would be sitting in the dentist's chair, knowing and dreading the fact that yes, those pesky wisdom teeth will have to come out. And even though you do know you will be walking around with yellow chipmunk cheeks for the next two weeks, the anticipation of the dentist telling you is almost as bad as the actual surgery.

There's good anticipation too, like when you receive an award and you're sitting all dressed up in the front row just waiting for your name to be called. That anticipation is a little better, because it's less dire but still will cause anxiety on a conscious level.

So here's the deal: I'm still waiting for the phone to ring. I don't know what's worse, the anticipation or that insidious Carly Simon song.

Letters to the Editor

Oppose NATO expansion

To the editor:

The University of Massachusetts community should be aware that once the U.S. senators return to Washington from their Easter recess they will vote on a key issue — an expansion of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) to include Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic. This crucial vote will negatively affect U.S.-Russian relations in the decades ahead because the Russian government feels that, once again, it is being encircled and that a new divide will mark Europe's map. Moreover, NATO expansion will increase our tax burden by billions of dollars. We need to tell our senators that they must call for a delay on a vote until a national debate has taken place and the total costs of expansion have been considered.

Instead of strengthening the military forces of the three candidate states, why not begin a new round of force reduction talks which would cut the level and the cost of armed forces in Europe?

It must be noted that senators have been the target of a massive $51 million lobbying campaign by U.S. arms contractors (Northrop Grumman, Lockheed Martin, Boeing, McDonnell Douglas, etc.) seeking to sell weapons, communication systems and other military equipment to the three Central and Eastern European states. NATO expansion would offer these arms manufacturers a new and hugely lucrative market because, under NATO rules, new members are required to upgrade their militaries and make them compatible with those of the NATO countries.

Members of the UMass community should get in touch immediately with senators Edward Kennedy (e-mail: senator@kennedy.senate.gov) and John Kerry (john_kerry@kerry.senate.gov) and ask them to support a resolution to delay a vote until a national debate has taken place. If no such resolution is forthcoming, the senators should be asked to vote against NATO expansion.

GEO within rights

To the editor,

Sean Werle (letter to the editor, 4/13) is free to disagree with the collection of agency fee and it is within his rights to attempt a lawsuit, but it is not a very productive use of his time or energies. He needs to understand a few important facts:

1) The collection of agency fee is totally legal under Massachusetts Labor Law, Chapter 150E.

2) All of the other five campus unions collect an agency fee. The only reason GEO has not collected this fee for the last seven years is due to the fact that grad student employees were not formally recognized as public employees under the law.

3) Agency fee amounts to less than 2 percent of one's paycheck and when totaled for the year is still far less than what grad employees will be receiving in pay raises, negotiated by GEO for next year. We welcome questions and dialogue about the implementation of agency fee. However, we did make every effort to alert all grad employees of this change prior to the contract ratification. Those opposed to its implementation were free to vote the contract down. Instead it was ratified by an overwhelming majority.

Reevaluating the SATs

It is part of human nature to categorize. For centuries, scientists have placed things into certain groups in order to make sense of the world. This makes life neat and organized. We know where things belong and what they are used for. However, this type of science causes a problem.

Along with grouping things comes social, political and economic meaning. Associations are made to certain groups and these have numerous influences upon those groups. For example, on a college application many categories appear. Race, gender and family income are a few. Already we have an idea of what kind of person someone is based on this information. Is this the American way? How do we include all people? Must there be a cutoff? Who deserves more? The Honors College has provoked various discussions on campus because of these concerns, one of which is its emphasis on SAT scores.

The troubles with standardized tests go beyond the fallacy of indicating student success.

Steve Gold

At many universities around the country, SAT scores have been given a lower profile as part of the admissions process. This is due to the inherent inadequacies of standardized tests as indicators of student success in institutions of higher learning. About 300 universities, approximately 15 percent of the nation's schools, no longer require SAT scores from applicants.

The troubles with standardized tests go beyond the fallacy of indicating student success. While doing away with standardized testing as an admission requirement is good for all students, it is imperative concerning students of color. In fact, keeping the requirement is detrimental to students of color. For years there have been allegations that the tests are biased based on gender and race, but the effects of such biases, as well as more subtle disadvantages, are grossly under-reported.

The University of California system has been seriously considering in the past year doing away with the SAT requirement. According to Eugene E. Garcia, Dean of the School of Education at the University of California at Berkeley, 2,000 Latino students were not able to attend UC Berkeley last year because of SAT scores (Los Angeles Times, 10/1/97, page B2). The Washington Post (9/20/97 page A3) reports that projections indicate a 70 percent decline in Latino enrollment at the UC flagship campuses even though the Latino population in California continues to grow.

It has been commonly reported that black and Latino students on average score lower on SAT exams than the national average. A higher percentage of black and Latino students attending poor public schools largely explains the disparity. Also, living in economically disadvantaged communities disproportionately denies many black and Latino students access to calculators (which are allowed for use on exams though use is not indicated nor considered in evaluating score) or expensive, private preparatory classes. Median family income, says Garcia, has been found to be the strongest correlation with performance on SATs.

SAT scores may reflect the social class of students but are useless as a tool for determining if a student is a good candidate for matriculation. Garcia's Latino Eligibility Task Force performed a study of several hundred SAT scores and academic performance in the universities. Garcia poses the question, "Does the SAT tell us who is going to do well in college? Then if it does... does it... do so at the cost of another policy that says we want to be sure that the university is open to all?" His answer is that "the SAT requirement fails on both of those counts" (Los Angeles Times).

If Commonwealth (Honors) College is looking for the best of students to offer a place in its program, application requirements should not cripple a large part of its application pool. Requiring SAT scores in the process of accepting or declining students can only hurt the chances of black and Latino students, as well as any economically disadvantaged students. With a history of problems concerning diversity on this campus, Commonwealth College cannot afford to hinder the matriculation of black and Latino students.

Garcia suggests not that the SATs be done away with entirely. An admissions process, he contends, should rest upon a variety of factors: high school grades, extra- curricular activities, references, and SAT scores. Students who do extraordinary work in high school should not be denied entrance because they do not meet a minimum SAT score requirement.

In order that representation within the Honors College be inclusive rather than exclusive, and in order to create an opportunity for greater diversity in the student body, it is in the interest of the administration not to have a minimum SAT score requirement. In its place, other factors which may more accurately indicate the likelihood of student success (e.g. extra-curricular activities) should be more heavily weighed.

The other side

I'm generally not too keen on holidays. Christmas has become little more than an obligation. Thanksgiving a burden. Halloween a drunken blur. Easter usually goes by without my even noticing. When I was a kid, it was nothing but an excuse to steal my sister's black jelly beans and eat too much ham. I had no knowledge, or any interest, of its religious background; I was raised a confirmed heathen.

Recently, Easter's been getting about as much of my attention as the Whitewater scandal. So when I was invited to my friend's house for their customary Easter bash, I mostly regarded it as an excuse to drink during the day. But on a whim, I decided to go to church for the Easter service. I crammed in with the rest of the twice-a-year Christians, thoroughly regretting my decision. I was starving, and in no mood for singing hymns or listening to sermons.

As much as there is to complain about, there's always something to be happy about.

Gerrit DeYoung

I was feeling a little guilty for my lack of spirit. Those rare times I do go to church I can usually at least enjoy the serenity, or try to learn something about a tradition I know nothing about. But I was restless, hungry and just wanted the service to end.

It almost did end without catching my interest. But the Pastor's sermon, delivered after all the singing, the passing of the collection plate, and interminable prayers, caught my ear. It was, of course, about Jesus' resurrection. He recounted the story of the cynics preparing his body for the grave, and their refusal to believe that he'd end up anywhere else. They were, as we know, pleasantly surprised when Jesus came back to life.

Like I said, I'm about as religious as a rock, and the story held no literal meaning for me whatsoever. But I couldn't get away from what it was really trying to say. All too often, we're guilty of cynicism. Like the cynics 2,000 years ago, we refuse to believe in the possible, and grumble about the inevitable. Despite a million reasons to have hope for the future, we assume calamity.

Of course, this is often the rational thing to do. It's a hard time to be a student at UMass, a citizen of the U.S., or to be a 20-something. But it's not all that bad, either. As much as there is to complain about, there's always something to be happy about. All too often, we forget about the second half of the equation.

It's spring. We've been grinding it out for a good six months now, and it hasn't always been pleasant. But we're done watching the leaves fall, we're done trudging through the snow, and the mud will dry up soon. It's time to look on the bright side.

Of course, this isn't an invitation to throw on the rose- tinted glasses. Things are wrong with the world, there are problems at UMass, and problems in our personal lives we'll have to deal with. But the main thrust of the pastor's sermon, and my column, is that we need to put it in perspective.

All too often, as an editorial columnist, I tend to dwell on the negative. My job is to find problems, and write about them. Like many, I often miss opportunities to write about things that have gone well, or potential solutions to problems.

So let me offer a solution: for a month — just a month — let's try to look for things that are going right. Let's try to generate solutions rather than complaints. Let's look for possibilities rather than tragedies.

Passover book a tasty treat

By Bryan Schwartzman

MATZO BALL MOON
Leslea Newman
Clarion Books

Imagine, an entire book devoted to one of the cornerstones of any Passover meal, the matzo ball.

Now I must say, those of who have had the opportunity to taste a lush, juicy matzo drenched in chicken broth will be a little biased toward the subject matter. Every year when I consider not going home for Passover my mother reminds me that there will be matzo ball soup, and I always end up going.

Leslea Newman, a Northampton resident for the past 15 years, has written a story of originality and tradition which can both entertain the reader while conveying the true meaning of the holiday. Matzo Ball Moon is about a family's annual experience at Passover and their relationship to each other. The book explores the joy associated with the ancient holiday, and illustrated how love of families members is as important a part of the holiday as the religious ritual.

The story's main character is a little girl named Eleanor. Every year Bubbie (a Yiddish word for grandmother) joins her Mama, Daddy and brother Joshua for a Seder. Eleanor helps Bubbie make matzo ball soup for the whole family. The light-hearted and colorful illustrations by Elaine Greenstein takes the reader through the process of preparing the soup.

The conflict of the book arises at the Seder when there are enough matzo balls for everybody except Bubbie. The family offers their soup to Bubbie since they have already eaten some, but Bubbie refuses, saying that her family's joy is her joy. Eleanor finds something even better for her grandmother, in the most unlikely of places.

The book works on many levels; It will excite children who may be first experiencing Passover, and the metaphor drawn between the moon and matzo ball will make the adult reader think.

"Passover has really been a special event," said Newman.

Newman said she had a special relationship with her grandmother and wanted to convey that in her work.

"Eleanor really wanted to give something to her grandmother. Her love for her grandmother was as big as the moon," she said.

Newman has written two previous Clarion books. She has also published collections of poetry and stories and has edited a writing manual.

She had some advice for prospective writers.

"It's important to be really disciplined, become really immersed in literary life and be very patient." A

Wu–Tang scores big again

Natalie Imbruglia
RCA

Former Australian television star Natalie Imbruglia is attempting to make a similar reinvention to the one Alanis Morissette successfully made a few years ago after she outgrew adolescent pop stardom. Much like Morissette's effort, Imbruglia's debut, Left of the Middle, is a mixed bag.

Certainly, Imbruglia appears to have a conscience, constantly guarding against the pitfalls all around her. On "Don't You Think?," she seems to be sending a message to herself as she sings "Brother shoots brother, but meanwhile you're fixing up your face." This tone of troubled self- regulation and pointed commentary on the vacuous lifestyles of the people around her dominates the album.

But whereas Morissette has broken through to a stage where she's revelling in her independence and freedom (as evidenced on her new single), Imbruglia is still in a joyless phase of self-discipline. It's this awkward, slightly cute ambience that starts to irritate over the course of the album, especially as Imbruglia is equally inhibited with her slight vocals.

Musically, she's an effective plagiarist, doing a creditable Portishead on "Leave Me Alone," sailing way too close to Morissette on "One More Addiction" and "Big Mistake" and sounding like Republica without the annoying shouty singer on the electronic bustle of "Impressed."

Mixed by Radiohead producer Nigel Godrich, Left of the Middle is quietly impressive on first listen. However, with the exception of "Torn" and "Smoke," the furrowed, emotionally-reserved songwriting has created a claustrophobic debut, which reveals that Imbruglia still has more skins to shed before she reaches her undoubted potential. Cappadonna

Trax On Trax Off

Only the lord may know how, but Wu-Tang has managed to put out another great album. It seems that every time you walk into the record store there is another Wu-Tang album in the hot new album racks. Cappadonna, the ninth member of the clan, has just released his solo album, The Pillage. Cappadonna was originally supposed to appear on the first Wu-Tang album, but was, unfortunately, in jail. It wasn't until Ghostface's Ironman album that we first got to hear the cherry-head kid. After flexing his muscles on Wu-Tang Forever, everyone was calling out for the self-proclaimed best dressed member of the Wu dynasty.

"Slang Editorial" opens this up in typical RZA-produced fashion with a hooking loop that is bound to get you open. Cappadonna's first words uttered are "I saw a fork in the road so I went straight." Like his claim, he is far from the average rapper. While most rappers tell stories that only Don Corleone can relate to, Cappadonna's songs show a more realistic side to growing up.

"Milk The Cow," the second single, is equally banging and features guest appearances by none other then the iron-lung Method Man. While the song is built on a darker sinister beat, it isn't dreary, but it just makes you want to hit repeat on your disc man. "Check For A Nigga" and "Run" are bound to be two more songs you are going to hear a lot of. The songs are catchy, potentially radio bound and they manage to hook you without ripping off Puff Daddy or The Firm.

One of the strengths of this album is that it is chill summer music despite its often bleak outlook. That sound embodies the lives of most urban-children, an ability to want to party and have a good time despite stress levels that are often overwhelming. Cappadonna even throws in a song about heartbreak on "Young Hearts," which gets hilarious when the cherry-headed rapper sings for us.

The best track, the one that will melt on your tables and leave them stickier than honey is "Dart Throwing." The track also features Method "Johny Blaze" Man and has a slower, almost southern, beat. In fact, it sounds like a blues song you would hear on the porch of a Louisiana swamp house. If this doesn't get you open, you need to do a serious re-evaluation of yourself. A- (Adam Dlugacz)

CITY OF ANGELS SOUNDTRACK
Various Artists
Warner/Sunset

I'm not sure what Alanis Morissette was doing all these years, besides maybe sipping cocktails on the beaches of the newly founded Alanis island. But after listening to "Uninvited," one of the few original tracks off the City of Angels soundtrack, she may have been in a different dimension all together.

Haunting and mystic, "Uninvited" is a eerie departure from anything on the much-overplayed Jagged Little Pill, with the exception, of course, of Morissette's near-whiny, craving, one-tone vocals. "Uninvited" sounds more like it belongs in The Crow than City of Angels, but it nonetheless is a horrifically tragic tribute to the movie's spiritual qualities.

The soundtrack is repetitive, but achieves the appropriate mood via solemn ballads from Peter Gabriel — yes, Peter Gabriel — and Sarah McLachlan, who's "Angel" is not her best, but her most touchy-feely metaphysical.

The Goo Goo Dolls' "Iris" sounds a lot like every other Collective Soul-type offering, but features the catchy chorus "Don't want the world to see me, cause I don't think they'd understand/When everything's made to be broken, I just want you to know who I am." It's the second best track on the album.

Mixed in with classics from U2, Jimi Hendrix and Eric Clapton, City of Angels is easy listening, symbolized by composer Gabriel Yared's violin-based, folksy, simple but annoyingly repetitive theme. B (Bryan McAllister)

WHEN DID YOU LEAVE HEAVEN
Lisa Ekdahl
RCA/Victor

There seems to be a pattern of Swedish female pop artists trying to sound like they are three or four years old. Lisa Ekdahl fits into this mold very nicely with her U.S. debut, When Did You Leave Heaven. Unfortunately, Ekdahl deviates from the bubblegum pop that has made her successful in her native Sweden and tries to simulate a jazz album. Ekdahl's cute, girlish voice does not translate well to slow, moody jazz. When Did You Leave Heaven is a perfect example of how awkward an album can sound when a voice is too weak for the music it is paired with.

From the first few seconds of the title track, one can sense that something is definitely wrong here. As accompanied by the Peter Nordahl Trio, it seems that Ekdahl is the butt of a cruel joke perpetrated by her record executives. The novelty continues as Ekdahl covers songs written by Cole Porter and George and Ira Gershwin, among others. The more Ekdahl sound like a preschooler, the more songs like "My Heart Belongs to Daddy" (Electra complex, anyone?) become laughable.

It is understandable that Ekdahl would not want to debut in the States with cheesy, radio ready pop straight from Scandinavia as so many others have — including ABBA, Ace of Base, The Cardigans, Aqua, etc... But as it is now, When Did You Leave Heaven will probably be laughed out of the stores. It's hard to take a voice that cute very seriously. C- (Kevin Monahan)

Fallen beam sends Yankees over to Shea;

Lindros returns to Philadelphia lineup with a vengeance after injury

NEW YORK (AP) — Hundreds of city workers combed Yankee Stadium yesterday, inspecting the 75-year-old ballpark for any more defects like the one that sent a steel joint crashing into the seats a day earlier.

A 500-pound steel joint dating to 1927 fell from the upper level Monday, hours before the New York Yankees' game with the Anaheim Angels. The mishap caused two games with the Angels to be postponed, and moved a third to Shea Stadium.

No one was injured and no fans were inside the House that Ruth Built at about 2 p.m. when the steel chunk fell, an estimated 40 feet from the underside of the upper deck into the mezzanine section down the third-base line.

As the Yankees held batting practice yesterday, about 300 workers from eight city agencies inspected the beams and joints in the interior of the stadium's upper deck.

"The engineers are working their way from the top of the stadium down," said Jerome Hauer, director of the mayor's office of emergency management.

The city was taking no chances, however.

"Clearly the games in the next couple of days will not be played here," Hauer said.

He said the inspectors found the comparable joint in the underside of the upper deck down the first-base line and determined it was structurally sound. The joints were added to the stadium during an expansion in 1927, four years after it opened.

"Yankee Stadium is crumbling. Everybody is in a little disarray right now," pitcher David Cone said Monday.

A crowd of more than 20,000 had been expected to watch the Angels and Yankees.

"This could have been a terrible tragedy," Mayor Rudolph Giuliani said. "You could see that if someone were sitting there at the time that the beam came down, that person would now be dead."

"As a Yankee fan, I'd rather that we were playing, but as a mayor we have to make sure it's safe."

The episode gave added ammunition to Yankees owner George Steinbrenner, who has been seeking a new stadium. The team's lease with the city expires in 2002.

"We'll overcome this one, but we've got to be sure it doesn't happen again," the owner told The New York Times. "If that means a new stadium, we'll have to see."

Babe Ruth christened Yankee Stadium with a homer the day it opened, April 18, 1925, and it has been home to some of baseball's greatest players ever since. Hall of Famers like Ruth, Lou Gehrig, Joe DiMaggio, Mickey Mantle and Reggie Jackson have helped the Yankees win 23 World Series championships.

"It's a real shame this happened. This is a shrine to baseball," Angels manager Terry Collins said.

The stadium, owned by the city and leased to the team, is set to celebrate its 75th anniversary Saturday. Those plans were put on hold, however, when the 18-inch expansion joint, used to connect beams, crushed seat 7 in row B of section 22.

The seat was smashed to pieces and a 6-inch hole was gouged in the concrete. The joint tore another hole in the ceiling of the upper deck.

The collapse also caused a chain reaction in altering this week's schedule.

Night games Monday and Tuesday were immediately called off, and the Yankees announced they would play the Angels at 1 p.m. today at Shea Stadium, home of the rival New York Mets. The Mets are also scheduled to play at Shea tonight, at 7:40 p.m. against the Chicago Cubs.

A replacement joint was being built in the Bronx, and Giuliani said it might be installed if no other problems are found. If the park % not repaired, the Yankees and Detroit Tigers could move their three-game series this weekend to Shea.

The teams, though, might play instead at Tiger Stadium if repairs are not finished. Acting commissioner Bud Selig, Al. president Gene Budig and the Yankees discussed a contingency plan to shift the series to Detroit, and then move the following weekend's series from Tiger Stadium to New York.

Bill LeSuer, the Angels' muscle therapist, was walking on the field toward the ballyard Monument Park beyond the left-field fence when the joint fell.

"There was a real loud bang," he said. "I looked up and saw a lot of debris falling down, a lot of concrete."

The stadium was extensively remodeled in 1974 and 1975, forcing the Yankees to play at Shea until the renovated ballpark reopened in 1976.

Steinbrenner has complained that the current stadium doesn't have enough parking and amenities.

Stadium superintendent Bob Wilkinson said the ballpark is inspected once a year.

"There is a lot of foundation work and steel still here from 1923," he said. "But this stadium is in good shape. This is an isolated incident."

The Yankees played a practice game today at the stadium against their Double-A Norwich team, although no fans were allowed in. The Angels also will work out at the park.

After the Monday night's game was postponed, people milled outside the stadium and police told fans at subway stops to turn around and go home.

The Yankees have talked about building a new stadium near Madison Square Garden in Manhattan, or one near Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J.

Yankee Stadium is the fourth-oldest ballpark in the majors, behind Tiger Stadium (1912), Boston's Fenway Park (1912) and Chicago's Wrigley Field (1914).

It was not the first time a structural problem has postponed ball games.

The Kingdome in Seattle and Olympic Stadium in Montreal have had trouble with falling objects in recent years. At the 1989 World Series, Candlestick Park was rocked by a major earthquake that caused minor damage to the ballpark, and Game 3 was postponed for 10 days.

Lindros returns to Flyers lineup

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP) — After 18 games sidelined by a concussion, Flyers captain Eric Lindros didn't waste any time Monday night letting the Buffalo Sabres know he was back in the lineup. Looking strong from the opening shift, Lindros was a force in keeping the Sabres from gaining possession of the puck in their own zone for the first several minutes of the first period.

It was what he had been waiting for since suffering a concussion March 7 after a hit by Darius Kasparaitis of the Pittsburgh Penguins.

"Anytime you've been away from the game as long as I have and it's something you grew up doing and something you love to do and it's been taken away... yeah, there's a lot of excitement built up inside me," Lindros said after a practice skate earlier Monday at Marine Midland Arena.

Lindros shook off the effects of his injury about 10 days ago — in plenty of time to get in top shape for the playoffs, he said. "I felt really strong," he said. "I wasn't having any symptoms and after hard skates I wasn't getting the dizziness and the headaches."

With his brother never far from his thoughts, though, he wasn't willing to rush things. Brett Lindros of the New York Islanders quit hockey after a series of concussions.

"I think the biggest thing is having a sense of when to come back and making sure that when you do come back you're not putting yourself in a position where you're much more susceptible to having the whole process re-occur," he said.

"I don't want to step in and miss the first round or the second round" of the playoffs, he said.

Playoff race is coming down to final week

The playoff picture is starting to get a lot clearer across the National Hockey League.

The two conferences are basically mirror images of each other. Seven teams are already booking flights and hotel reservations, while the final spot remains up-for-grabs in each conference.

Starting things off in the Eastern Conference, the Islanders, Rangers, Panthers and Lightning have all been eliminated. Ottawa leads Carolina by three points for the final spot, with the winner of that race playing New Jersey in the first round of the playoffs.

The Hurricanes took a giant step backwards with a tough 3-2 loss to the Bruins on Monday night, and with that, it seems like the last-second demise of this organization will come to fruition again. It doesn't matter whether they are the New England Whalers, Hartford Whalers, or Carolina Hurricanes, they always seem to choke in crunch time. This year appears to be no different.

Ottawa, on the other hand, may be one of the teams that no one wants to face in the playoffs. The Senators don't have any superstars, but they have slowly, but surely earned their playoff berth.

Michael Kobylanski on the

The fourth-seventh spots in the conference are currently separated by a measly two points. Buffalo, Boston, Washington and Montreal are all in the hunt for home ice advantage. However, the teams that end up struggling in the final week of the season will end up having to deal with Philadelphia or Pittsburgh in the first round.

Moving over to the West, Edmonton, San Jose and Chicago are in the hunt for the final two spots. However, one of the teams in this trio will end up watching the playoffs on television instead of playing in them. That team will join Toronto, Calgary, Vancouver and Anaheim, which have all been eliminated from playoff contention already.

The race for the number one seed is still up for grabs between Dallas and Detroit. Colorado appears to have the two seed sewn up, while St. Louis should host Los Angeles in the four/five series. Phoenix has sole possession of the sixth spot right now, but could fall to eighth should they stumble this week.

Alright, enough about the playoffs.

• Jaromir Jagr is going to claim the scoring title this year. This award only goes to show how great of a player this guy is. To put things into simplest terms, he is a winner.

He's won Stanley Cups, an Olympic Gold medal, and has played with some of the best players of all-time (e.g. Mario Lemieux). There were some skeptics who wondered how good the Penguins would be this year without Super Mario.

Well, they have fared just fine. They are going to win the Northeast Division title, and the main reason why is because of leaders like Jagr and Ron Francis. These two guys in particular have stepped up their play, and have done an excellent job of getting the most out of the players around them.

The Penguins have pulled off a minor surprise by winning the division, but don't be shocked if they pull a major surprise and win the Eastern Conference.

• There are also some teams who no one wants to face in the playoffs.

The first team that comes to mind is Buffalo. Why the Sabres you ask? Flash back to the Winter Olympics. No one wanted to face the Czech Republic. Why? Two words: Dominik Hasek. The Dominator was the reason why the Czechs won the gold.

Now it's playoff time, and Hasek is on a roll. For the team who slacks off during the final week, their punishment may be getting the Sabres in the first round. Just a little extra incentive to play well this week, right boys.

Next on the list is St. Louis. The Blues have quietly gone unnoticed in the Western Conference behind the big three of Dallas, Detroit and Colorado. However, they have a solid one-two tandem of Grant Fuhr and Jamie McLennan between the pipes, even though Fuhr is currently out with an injury.

And just remember, any team with Brett Hull on it and a supporting cast with guys like Geoff Courtnall and Chris Pronger is capable of making a playoff run. That is, as long as the goaltending holds up.

After all, forget about the scoring. Defense and goaltending wins Stanley Cups.

UMass takes pair from Hartford

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Last Sunday afternoon, the Massachusetts softball team experienced something it has not dealt with too much in the last 24 games — a 2-1 loss to North Carolina.

Well, like your good ole grandad sitting on the porch on a sunny spring day, it was back to the good old days (of not so long ago) for the Minutewomen yesterday afternoon, sweeping the University of Hartford in West

Massachusetts	10

Hartford. With the two wins over the Hawks, UMass is now victorious in 21 of its last 24 games, which goes back to their 8-0 win over Bradley on March 14 in Tallahassee, Fla.

Junior Danielle Henderson picked up the 4-0 win for UMass in the first game of the afternoon, extending her record to 15-6 on the season, while senior Liz Wagner (three strikeouts, three walks, one hit batsman) gave up only two hits to the Hawks in the nightcap for the 10-0 verdict. However, it was not all fun and games for Henderson (five hits, 11 strikeouts), as her streak of 26.2 innings without allowing a hit ended on junior Tammy Jaworski's single to lead off the game.

In turn, four Minutewomen stepped up to the plate to take care of the offense, as all four registered at least two hits in the game, with senior co-captain Tracy Osier leading the way for the junior threesome of Octavia Brown, Mandy Galas and Becky George. Osier, a centerfielder from Mattydale, N.Y., went 5-for-8 on the afternoon, including a RBI single in the three-run third inning of the 4-0 win.

The senior co-captain felt that the UMass offense was a tale of two games — a solid effort in the nightcap, but a less-than-solid effort in the afternoon opener.

"In the first game, we came out flat, and we didn't capitalize on our chances," Osier said. "But in the second game, we came out swinging. We were a lot more poised at the plate, and we took care of those chances that we didn't take care of in the first game."

For Osier, the Minutewomen bats could have been cold for one reason — a 20-degree temperature difference from Amherst to West Hartford, yet, in her mind, the pitching was what kept UMass' chances for winning warm.

"It was a great pitching effort by both pitchers, especially with the 20-degree differential," Osier said. "We came out for the game in shorts, and we ended up in pants. So, Harry did well for herself, but Liz just pitched great."

The three-run third inning for the Minutewomen began on junior Kelly Buckley's single, with freshman Kiley Scofield drawing a walk to put runners at first and second. With the top of the lineup in the warmup circle, Brown dropped a bloop single into right field to score Buckley, and Galas drove in her 15th RBI of the season with a single off the glove of third baseman Marci Simoneau to score Scofield.

Up came Osier to the plate, and her single to left field drove in Brown to complete the scoring in the third inning. George's single in the fifth inning drove in Osier for the final run in the 4-0 win.

The bats for the Minutewomen lit up the nightcap, with UMass compiling 14 hits in the 10-0 win. Galas led off the first inning with a triple, and senior co-captain Kim Gutridge obliged nicely with a sacrifice fly out of the three spot for her 31st RBI of the season.

The Minutewomen picked up additional runs in the second and sixth innings, but the seventh inning was the luckiest for UMass with the team plating seven runs.

The Minutewomen will return to Totman Field tomorrow, as they face Harvard for a 3 p.m. doubleheader. Looking ahead, they will also travel to Blacksburg, Va. on Friday in a doubleheader with the Hokies. UMass swept a pair from Virginia Tech last year in Amherst.

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

Mandy Galas and the Massachusetts softball team swept a doubleheader from Hartford yesterday to up their mark to 25-12 on the season.

Patriots have gaps to fill on draft day

With the New England Patriots holding six draft picks in the first three rounds of the NFL draft this weekend, one of Massachusetts' most beloved sports organizations is primed to create a dynasty for years to come.

The possibilities are endless, and the trade rumors are juicy. Almost anything can happen, so it should be no surprise to the New England fans if a number of trades are made with those top picks.

Obviously, the Pats' first objective is to obtain a running back to replace the departed Curtis Martin, who was swallowed up by the hungry Bill Parcells and the New York Jets. The top two ballcarriers coming from the collegiate ranks are Curtis Enis of Penn State and Fred Taylor of Florida.

Seth Koenig on the

Enis tends to be the No. 1 running back among the draft publications based on his staggering statistics in college, but Taylor, who had an impressive workout at the NFL combine after struggling through an injured foot during last season, is catching up fast.

Robert Edwards of Georgia is also a strong back whose stock is holding ground in the first round, but Taylor and Enis are the clear cut favorites. However, if New England ends up with the Bulldogs' star, it won't be a disappointment either.

Quarterback Drew Bledsoe has expressed interest in Enis and San Francisco free agent Terry Kirby, so expect the team to try to accommodate him.

To get either of the two top collegiate runners, Patriots owner Bob Kraft will need to trade up, meaning their 18th overall choice and a second or third could go to perhaps the Bears, Eagles or Rams for the right to select one of these players.

Another possibility is the rumor of a trade for Dallas Emmitt Smith. Cowboys' owner Jerry Jones loves the idea of getting more high selections in the draft, and since he sees his team sliding, he's willing to shop his franchise back. The Patriots' new offensive coordinator, Ernie Zampese used to coach Smith, and still likes him. Such an exchange would cost the Pats both of their first round picks, however, and considering they couldn't pay Martin, they probably won't be able to swing Smith either.

Next on the agenda for New England will be either a wide receiver, defensive back or defensive lineman, depending on who they think they can get at each position. Terry Glenn had a fantastic rookie year two years ago at the split end position, but has struggled with injuries since. Everybody in the league wants Marshall wideout Randy Moss, and the Pats might make their move with another trade similar to the one they may use to try to get Enis or Taylor.

If Moss is gone when the Patriots are on the clock, Utah's Kevin Dyson is a possibility with the 22nd overall pick. Dyson had a standout game in the Senior Bowl, and is ranked second to Moss among wideouts. Other options at that position are Germaine Crowell of Virginia, Kevin Simmons of Wisconsin and Jacquez Green from Florida.

The Patriots can wait until the later rounds to get a solid defensive back, so if they don't find the split end they're looking for, they might send their second first round choice to Oakland for Chester McGlockton, a Pro-Bowl defensive tackle. Greg Ellis of North Carolina and Jason Peter of Nebraska are two quality linemen that would be valuable as well, and both will probably be available at the 22nd spot.

Things get even more unpredictable from there on out, because there's no telling which of their remaining four top round draft picks they may have available should they go the trade route in round one.

At defensive back, the best athlete is Heisman trophy winner Charles Woodson from national champion Michigan, but New England won't even be close to getting him. The two top players that might be available in the second round will be Tennessee's Terry Fair or Florida State's Samari Rolle.

Behind those two, the talent drops off somewhat. Out of the two, Fair seems to be able to play taller receivers better, but Rolle had a tougher collegiate schedule and played on a better defense.

Running back Skip Hicks of UCLA or Ahman Green of Nebraska might be chosen late in round two or early in round three as sleeper picks to challenge Enis or Taylor.

The questions going into the draft are endless. Needless to say, it ought to be an interesting afternoon for football fans around the nation — especially in New England.

First lax night game brings NE foe to town

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The spotlight will be on the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team tonight. Literally.

For the first time in school history, the Minutemen will play under the newly installed lights at Richard F. Garber Field, when they take on Harvard at 7 p.m.

"We practice at night," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "But we've never competed at night. I think it's great. It's certainly sets a mood of excitement because it is a big thing."

That excitement will center around what Cannella describes as a big game.

"This is a very big game," he said. "We're coming off two losses and it's a New England game."

Currently the Crimson pose the most serious challenge to the Minutemen's bid for a second straight New England championship. Going into tonight's game, UMass is 4-0 against regional opponents, with Harvard and Brown left on the slate.

"That makes the game that much more important," Cannella said. "They are a strong team which has had success here before."

That means in order for the Minutemen to claim what would be their 21st win against Harvard, they have to come out firing from the beginning, something they didn't do the past two weekends against Loyola (a 10-8 loss in Baltimore last Saturday) and Duke (a home loss two weeks ago).

"[Those games] emphasized the fact we need to compete right off the bat," said Cannella, who also indicated tempo would play a key role in tonight's contest. "They like to play am up-tempo game. If we can keep them out of that, it works in our favor."

The Minutemen, who prefer a slower, more deliberate style of play, thrived against the Greyhounds last weekend when the pace slowed.

UMass will have its hands full with the Crimson attack, which includes a strong senior class. Mike Ferrucci and Jim Bevilacqua provided the experienced leadership that has guided Harvard to a 6-3, 3-1 Ivy League mark.

"They have a very good group of seniors," Cannella said. "Their senior leadership brings together a group comprised of good younger players."

Harvard will be trying to stop the offense of Mike McKeefrey, Mike DelPercio and Alex Racioppi, while attempting to get past the defensive wall of Harold Drumm, Mike Hanna, Jamie Doherty and goaltender John Kasselakis.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will travel to Hempstead, N.Y. today as it faces Hofstra University at 4 p.m. UMass (5-3) is recently coming off a strong outing against St. Joseph's, stifling the Hawks, 10-2.

Villanova (6-3, 3-1 America East) will be hosting the Minutewomen after winning four of its last five, including a dominating 20-6 victory over Villanova. Both teams will meet with some momentum coupled with recent tastes of defeat. The Flying Dutchwomen saw their four-game winning streak end after falling to Colgate, 11-8, last Friday. UMass could not control No. 11 Dartmouth a week ago, as it dropped a 16-7 decision.

Fay Naber

The Minutewomen can practically taste their next win, while Hofstra will be reluctant to allow any kind of start to a losing streak, especially on its homefield at Hofstra Stadium. UMass would also like to go into this weekend's home date with Syracuse on a positive note.

What the Minutewomen know is that however they play, they will exert themselves to counter the type of note played last year as the Flying Dutchwomen defeated UMass, 12-5, at Totman Field. In last season's contest it was senior goaltender Stephanie Clarke who played the orchestral role, making 20 quality saves and chipping in an assist for good measure, as she set up fellow classmate Tierney Clark for the goal.

The win gave Hofstra the edge in the all-time series at 4- 3, an edge the Minutewomen will seek to eliminate today as they fortunately do not have either Clark(e) to contend with. Fittingly, it may be the Flying Dutchwomen who are on their heels early as they try to contend with the UMass attack, including freshman Fay Naber. Naber is coming off a four-goal performance at St. Joe's, which pushed her into the second spot on the team scoring chart.

Junior attack Laura Korutz will also look to continue her steady point production, as the team leader's two goals and two assists against the Hawks gave her 25 total points (20 goals, 5 assists) for the season.

Sophomore attack Noelle Gorski and senior midfielder Jen Herker were also among the Minutewomen multiple scorers in the last game, tallying two assists apiece. Also playing well was the entire UMass defense, hounding the Hawk attack tenaciously throughout the game and halting several scoring opportunities for St. Joe's.

Hofstra, however, has several offensive weapons that the defense will have to be aware of. Among them will be Kristin Streeker, who has racked up 30 goals and a team leading 36 points thus far. Another player who has been making the most of her opportunities has been Carol Ann Costello, dishing out a team leading 15 assists, and notching 26 points on the season.

Melissa Anderson

Freshmen goalies Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi have split time this season and will look for help from a formidable Minutewomen defensive line to keep UMass' on track.

Mosque reconstruction banned by mayor

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovna (AP) — The mayor of Bosnia's largest Serb-held city has refused to allow an ancient mosque to be rebuilt — a decision that drew bitter reaction yesterday from Muslims.

The Ferhadija mosque, built in 1579 and a landmark in the northern city of Banja Luka, was blown up by Bosnian Serbs in 1993 and turned into a parking lot. Soon after, the city's remaining 16 mosques were blown up — among the hundreds the Serbs destroyed in the 1992-95 war.

Seeing Banja Luka as the center of the new moderate Bosnian Serb government, Bosnia's Islamic Community asked mayor Djordje Umicevic to permit rebuilding of Ferhadija mosque. The top international official in Bosnia, Carlos Westendorp, backed the request. But Umicevic was firm: "It would be an insult to the Serb people," he wrote back to Westendorp.

The rebuilding "would be perceived by the Serb people as the darkest humiliation, it would open old wounds and have broad consequences," he wrote, adding that the mosque symbolized "the gravest days of slavery" of Orthodox Serbs — 500 years of Ottoman rule.

Mother distraught over baby mix-up

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) — A new mother who was sent home with the wrong baby is refusing to pick up the newborn the hospital insists is her real child, saying she isn't convinced the mixup has been straightened out.

The Regional Medical Center said yesterday it has correctly matched the babies to their mothers. But LaDonna Harris is not buying it.

"I just can't understand how they can give me the wrong baby. I know that's my baby," she told WHBQ-TV on Tuesday.

Ms. Harris, 23, a single mother, gave birth on Friday. The other baby, whose mother's identity was withheld by the hospital, was born Saturday.

On Sunday the babies were apparently placed in the wrong bassinets following circumcisions and given to the wrong mothers. Ms. Harris went home with the wrong baby later that day. On Monday, the other mother noticed that the baby brought to her in the hospital had a different skin pigment from what she remembered. Hospital officials checked the wristband and realized the error, said Dr. Bruce Steinhauer, the hospital's president and chief executive. Ms. Harris was called that same day and handed the baby over.

The baby was allowed to go home Tuesday with the other mother. The newborn the hospital says belongs to Ms. Harris remains at Regional Medical.

Alcohol policy issues debated by task force

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

The Resource Network met with members of the Alcohol Beverage Policy Task Force yesterday to discuss recommendations made their draft report which was issued on March 18.

Susan Pearson, vice chancellor of students and chairperson of the Task Force, reviewed many of the recommended changes and areas of concern with the group.

"I don't think it is possible any longer for us to ignore the issues alcohol has raised," Pearson said.

"The disturbing behavior that occurred at Homecoming [in September 1997] made us realize the growing alcohol problem that requires attention on our campus... but this problem is not unique just to our campus," she said.

Following homecoming weekend, Chancellor David K. Scott appointed a Task Force to examine the current University of Massachusetts' alcohol policy.

The 50-member Task Force had representatives from almost every community on this campus.

"The Task Force took as its charge to look at a whole range of issues associated with alcohol use on this campus," Pearson said.

The 12-page draft report was divided into three main areas by the Task Force members, recommended policy changes, recommendations for enhancement of enforcement efforts in the residence halls and recommended areas that require further study.

One such recommended policy change was re-wording the Alcoholic Beverage purpose statement to expand "the scope of the policy which previously covered on-campus use of alcohol," the draft stated.

A second recommendation Pearson discussed was allowing a sponsoring organization of an event to deny admittance of any individual.

Areas that the Task Force decided required further study were better enforcement with the alcohol policy; looking at the role of a Resident Assistant as a counselor and policy enforcer; and consistent sanctions for policy violators.

"The Task Force concluded enforcement of the policy was uneven," Pearson said. "In other words two people who break the same policy should suffer the same consequence and be given the same sanctions.

"Students who violate an alcohol policy will be sanctioned and receive an automatic referral. This is designed to prevent repetition in behavior."

In addition, Task Force member Tom Sadlowski, who is also a Resident Assistant, said although getting residents to attend educational programs is often difficult, a bigger problem is there are no administrative follow-ups after a resident is written up.

"A resident who is written up may be put on probation. But that student may be put on probation 11 times because they don't care. Probation means nothing on this campus in terms of our enforcement," Sadlowski said.

Recommended areas for further study included a possible letter to be sent to all accepted students and their parents covering UMass' alcohol policy as well as sanctions and counseling services available across campus.

In addition, peer education workshops addressing alcohol issues during freshman orientation and engaging the local media, including the Daily Collegian, in a discussion of alcohol advertising, were also recommended.

Other sections to the Alcohol Task Force included programming and fraternities and sororities, including the University-Town of Amherst relationship and responsibility of students which were not discussed fully at the meeting due to time constraints.

In all, the task force constructed a draft of almost 100 recommendations.

Following Pearson's presentation, a discussion began in which most faculty and students present supported the recommendations. However, graduate student and member of the task force Ed Cutting had several disagreements with the recommendations.

"Alcohol abuse on this campus is a symptom, it is a symptom of all the

A memorial service will be held for Andrew Sala on Thursday, April 23 at 5:15 p.m. in the Newman Center Chapel.

Sala, 20, of Mendon was a sophomore at the University of Massachusetts when he died Tuesday, March 10 after falling from his fifth-floor room window in Cashin Residence Hall.

His body was found on the first-floor ledge of Cashin at approximately 8:50 a.m.

The Medical Examiner's office in Springfield has not released Sala's cause of death but according to University officials, foul play and suicide have been ruled out as contributing factors to his death.

He was a chemical engineering majoring was in the midst of changing his major to the school of management.

Circumstances surrounding Sala's fall are still under investigation.

UM police get tougher

New equipment borrowed to patrol roads

Julia Sears, a junior communication major, tries the PBT (Preliminary Breathalizer Test) yesterday outside the Mullins Center.

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

As part of the University of Massachusetts Police Department's "Street Safety" campaign this month, two pieces of road-side safety equipment have been borrowed from the Hampshire County Safe Roads program to assist them in their efforts.

A speed monitor/visual radar display and a preliminary breath test unit (PBT), a new device to measure how much alcohol an individual has consumed will help police target drunk drivers and enforce speed limits.

The speed monitor, a large screen placed on the side of a road, electronically displays the speed of an on-coming vehicle. Public Safety plans on testing the monitor at several locations on campus during the month.

Yesterday public safety officials demonstrated both the speed monitor and the PBT on Commonwealth Avenue for the campus community and public.

The PBT is a hand-held device which measures the blood alcohol concentration (BAC) when a subject blows into it. These PBTs are used by officers after a standard field sobriety test to confirm an established probable cause.

In addition to the speed monitor and PBT, pedestrian safety will also be strictly enforced.

"We want to educate people and increase their awareness of the traffic laws. In the process, we'll hopefully make the roadways on campus safer for both drivers and pedestrians," Deputy Police Chief Barbara O'Connor said.

The purpose of this month long safety campaign is to educate and raise awareness to the UMass community. O'Connor stressed that citations will still be issued for traffic violations and arrested will be made for drunk driving.

Safe Roads is a community traffic safety program funded by the Governor's Highway Safety Bureau and Hampshire County. Their mission is to "reduce traffic crashes and resulting injuries and fatalities though the administration of community based traffic safety efforts in the County."

Safe Roads offers an equipment library program and local police departments can check out equipment for education and enforcement of traffic laws.

"These are expensive pieces of equipment and not something that is used everyday, so being able to check out the equipment from us is really effective," Christine Driscoll, Safe Roads Project Coordinator said.

Internet traffic growing

WASHINGTON — Traffic on the Internet is doubling every 100 days, the government said yesterday in the latest snapshot of the exploding information technology industry. Business use is growing fastest, but as many as 62 million Americans are now using the worldwide network and are even getting comfortable making credit card purchases.

The Commerce Department said 10 million people across the United States and Canada made purchases - from airline tickets to books to automobiles - on the World Wide Web by the end of 1997, up from 7.4 million people six months earlier.

SGA senators disapprove of Kilbourne cabinet appointees

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) approved appointments to the executive cabinet by acting President Peter Kilbourne, despite protests from some senators.

"My goal for the cabinet in these two weeks [before the new elections] is primarily for the process of the elections to be facilitated as much as possible," Kilbourne said.

The five appointments to the cabinet were all approved by the senate. However, there was resistance to each of the appointments.

Senator Paul Ferro (Commuter At-Large) felt appointing cabinet members was a waste of time because they will have to resign when a new president is elected in the new elections in two weeks.

"We're having new elections in two weeks there is no point in appointing a cabinet. I'm going to argue against all five appointments," Ferro said. "They can do a lot of damage in two weeks. This is not an elected president. He's been elected by the senate last year. This is as undemocratic as you can get."

Senator Seth Avakian (Southwest, John Adams) did not approve of Ferro's decision to oppose the appointments.

"Just when I thought my list to quit the SGA couldn't get any bigger, you guys do this," Avakian said.

Avakian felt having cabinet appointments was important.

"The question is do we want to have a mildly effective government for two weeks or do we want to have an empty vacuum when the administration has an open opportunity to push the alcohol policy through?" Avakian said.

The cabinet is made up of the Secretary of Administrative Affairs, Secretary of the Registry, Attorney General, Secretary of University Policy and Secretary of Finance.

Eleanor Gerome was appointed Secretary of Administrative Affairs.

Senator Jodi Bailey (Commuter At-Large) spoke in favor of the appointment.

"She is extremely competent. Even if it's only for two weeks we need someone to do the job," Bailey said. "We can't look much worse than we already do and if we stop this we will look totally inept."

Senator Eric Magazu felt the appointment would discredit the SGA.

> "... Do we want to have a mildly effective government for two weeks or do we want to have an empty vacuum when the administration has an open opportunity to push the alcohol policy through? "
> — Senator Seth Avakian

"We don't need to look worse by making these appointments and then having them resign in two weeks," Magazu said.

Some senators felt the appointment of the Secretary of the Registry was critical to helping Registered Student Organization's (RSO).

"We could have some pretty ticked off RSO's if we don't have this position filled," Kilbourne said.

"We need to show them [RSO] we are professional and have the staff to service them," Sandra Brookely, appointee to the Secretary of the Registry said.

Senator Brandon Beane (Southwest, Cance) felt Brookely was not a good candidate for the position.

"For weeks we've been talking about how poorly the elections were run and Sandra was an elections commissioner," Beane said.

Attorney General Jesse Burchfield was the only incumbent appointed.

Ferro spoke against the appointment for Attorney General, reiterating his earlier protest.

"Why are we appointing positions for two weeks? You say we need them for two weeks. I disagree," Ferro said.

Avi Khana was appointed Secretary of University Policy.

"I'm out for the best of everyone," Khana said.

Brenda Fitzpatrick was appointed Secretary of Finance.

Joys of the open road

Something about being in a car brings people together. Maybe it's the soft hum of passing traffic, the bad 70's love songs on the radio, or inhaling car fumes — something about being in a car just makes me inherently happy.

Julie Fialkow

When I was driving home this weekend to New Jersey, the rain was pouring down in sheets and I could barely see the lines that guided me on the road. I picked up my good high school friend in Connecticut, and we headed off to the continuous strip mall that is New Jersey. We armed ourselves for the five-hour ride with iced mocha coffees and bags of gummy worms and malt balls.

What my friend and I have in common is dance fever. When a song came on the radio we'd sing along, regardless of whether we knew the words or not. We'd get the groove going and go crazy. The people driving by reacted by honking, picking their nose (oh wait, they probably didn't notice us), and looking at us like we were the long lost Fly Girls from planet Loser.

"The most memorable car trips for me grow out of getting lost."

She and I both admitted to liking the New Kid prodigies the Backstreet Boys. But she said I was sick because I knew some of their names and admitted to having a tiny crush on the tall one. She called me a molester and we laughed as I insisted they were at least 20-years-old.

I invited her over to my Passover Seder when I found out for the first time she was an eighth Jewish. I gave her a Bat Mitzvah and told her she was official. It didn't matter that her lineage to Judaism was in the Mafia and estranged from the family. I was excited, my mom would be happy I had another Jewish friend.

Car trips remind me of my childhood. I was an only child and my parents had to think of bizarre games to entertain me (translation: shut me up). My favorite was "count buses until you fall asleep" or "pretend you're Sleeping Beauty and go to sleep." One of my friends told me her family plays "Guess which fast food franchise is going to be at the next rest stop." If you're in New Jersey my bet is on Roy Rogers or Bob's Big Boy. It's scary how you can find the most asinine things to occupy yourself, that you would never ever do in the real world, outside of your car.

The most memorable car trips for me grow out of getting lost. Since my sense of direction could be likened to a drunk dog chasing its tail, I often get lost. Usually I get off the highway to go to the bathroom and end up at some weird local hangout. Then I turn out of the parking lot the wrong direction and end up going an hour out of my way. But along the way I see a high school that looks like an airport, a bar with a neon Bud Light pizza sign in the window, and a one-pump gas station that has weeds growing up around old rusty station wagons. These are what keep me interested; what makes me drift off into fantasy about what it would be like to live in this random town with a grocery store I've never heard of and people who wear clothes I'd never wear.

When I'm with someone else in the car I have a ride filled with funny quotations and secrets I'll probably forget as a few days go by. By myself in my car, I become eerily self- reflecting and deep. I try to figure out what I'm going to do with my life, and how many dogs I want to own. Yes, I come close to hitting people in the next lane, or missing an exit or two, but I get a lot more important things sorted out.

With summer approaching I can barely wait to experience the unique pleasure of warm-weather driving. My summer isn't official until I drive barefoot towards the Jersey shore, with the windows rolled down and the salty wind slapping my face. Playing obnoxious music is also much more pleasurable when you force your fellow drivers to hear it out your windows. So savor your car trips — even if they are just to Dairy Mart. After all, where else do you get to dance like a maniac while you're sober, and still maintain your respect; not like those shameless nosepickers.

Career daze

Although I've heard this sort of thing a lot in the past, especially around this time of year, it seems more pronounced, more abundant this year. Maybe it's because myself and the people I'm around are a little bit older now, and maybe a little bit more concerned with issues around what to do after college. I'm talking about career talk, or more generally what I like to call, talking up a lot of nothing to make yourself look a lot better than you are, but in reality making yourself look a lot worse than you are because everybody who hears you knows you're full of b.s.

Everyone knows this type of conversation. It usually starts with a person's aspirations around finishing his or her education here at UMass, and then goes on to how he or she will pursue some great career path in some great big idiotic field under the tutelage of some of the greatest, most pretentious, pompous meatheads in the world. The second part of this sort of speech usually includes the phrase, "Well, I want to... (fill in the blank)" about five or 10 times. It's the infantile "I want" that really defines this conversation genre.

"College kids are talking about plots designed to systematically oppress people for self–betterment without even realizing what they are saying."

Joe Sullivan

These conversations are annoying because of the fake tone in which they're usually spoken, sounding rehearsed like the person's been looking at himself or herself in the mirror for about five hours reciting it, and also because it's obvious that few people really know what they want to do. However, these aren't the big issues. The big issue has to do with the motives and ideas behind making these proposals for future greatness.

I have watched people — myself included — in these conversations many times, and the motives and ideas that are able to be read are rarely altruistic in nature.

There is a certain sense of extreme competition on the part of the self-promoter. It's that need to sound like he or she is doing the best thing that has ever been done in the four- billion-year history of the planet. Then there's a sense either of greed for money or greed for fame or some other type of attention or recognition as part of the conversation.

Occasionally you could hear someone talk about doing unostentatious community service type work, but it's very unusual. Instead, you'll hear about how much money will be paid, how much so-called prestige will be gained, how something will look good for a resume, how some rock star will be met. You could hear about some great opportunity to travel somewhere or live in some exciting city in a beautiful apartment with beautiful neighbors and a trendy social scene. It's all so wonderful.

The competition and the greed are ideals portrayed through our media, our government, and our economic system as means for achieving greatness, or, at the very least, happiness. Career talks translate these false ideals into more personal formats. What people don't seem to realize about coveting these ideas and the systems which manifest them is that a relatively small number will benefit. The majority of people are in some way exploited and kept down so that those of us with enough of that competitive edge (luck, connections, the white Anglo–Saxon Protestant privilege, etc.) or lust for fame and money are able to get what we want. College kids are talking about plots designed to systematically oppress people for self–betterment without even realizing what they are saying.

Now I understand that this is not the '60s and that a better way of doing things does not seem to be in sight. Due to political forces in this country which seem to dictate their ideology down the hierarchy to the smallest, most innocent child, it is a dark time when people must struggle to survive. Nevertheless, as people about to go into the world, why do we buy into what has already been laid out by those who in the past have stood to gain?

I guess that, in this era of low morals and no consciences, it's easier to go along with competition and greed as accepted values than to unite and strive to change the value system, thus changing society for the better.

The conversations about personal future career aspirations continue with little remorse.

Refute stereotypes, support GLBT community

To the Editor:

We are writing to inform the campus about "Friends of Jesus," a group from Maine that will be on the Campus Center Concourse on April 22 and 23. Last year they set up a table on the concourse under a large banner which read, "What's Wrong With Homosexuality." They also distributed a variety of written materials which promoted erroneous stereotypes and included medical and statistical misinformation.

As a public institution built on the principle of free expression, we have a legal responsibility to assure this group's right to be on our campus, to speak and distribute materials. But as a campus dedicated to community, diversity, and social justice, we also have the responsibility to speak out against their bigoted message. It is especially important that the whole campus responds when any one group in our community is the subject of misinformation and inaccurate stereotypes.

The Stonewall Center is coordinating a variety of responses, including: an informational table on the Campus Center Concourse, distribution of "Safe Zone" stickers, educational materials, and "Ally" buttons. Staff members who wish to attend educational events should be allowed release time. We urge you to stop by the Campus Center Concourse, attend one of the educational events, or in some way let the members of our community who are gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgender know they are supported and not alone.

Jesus Christ Superstar altered too much

To the Editor:

What better way to celebrate the season of Lent and the passion of Christ than to witness it through the form of a musical, as long as it is represented accurately?

However, I was offended by this play [Jesus Christ Superstar]. Maybe this criticism is what you wanted, because it says the play worked. Despite what you may think, this play didn't. You turned it into something else. Judas of Iscariot didn't shoot himself with a gun in a temple, he hung himself. You don't need to rewrite history to get your point across.

Correct me if I'm wrong, but I don't believe the genders of six apostles suddenly changed over time, did they? This is a politically correct era, but replacing eight male roles with females seems a bit off. There was a total of about 17 females in the play to a mere eight or nine male roles, in a play that is supposed to be male dominant. Some plays have more male roles, and other plays have more female roles, but that's because the writer wrote the play that way. This play was completely gender biased and the casting shows it.

Jesus Christ Superstar is about the passion of Christ. Be a little more truthful to it next time.

Corporatization at UMass

To the Editor:

Concerning the views of the UMass administration reported in the April 13 article, "Administrators back comp. sci. prof. in research scandal," I am quite worried about the corporatization of this University. It seems that the administration is more focused on providing big business with new opportunities than providing students with education.

As the article mentioned, the "technology transfer" has allowed University professors W. Bruce Croft and James P. Callan to use a facility, which was provided for by public moneys for the purpose of education, to serve as a factory where a private interest, Sovereign Hill Software, can set up shop. Usually a corporation would have to invest millions of dollars in machinery and buildings before it can hire workers at the salaries or wages it desires because only it has the technological facilities at which the work can be done, but in this case UMass helped them out.

Professor Joseph Larson, chair of the Faculty Senate Rules Committee, in defense of Sovereign Hill Software, pointed out that, "There are graduate students whose training comes through working on research projects like that." So graduate students, in order to obtain their degrees, are required to work for a private company which reaps profit off of their work, and this is supposed to be a positive thing? In addition, Larson cited the fact that UMass had a role to play in "creating new industries in the state and jobs that add value to the economy." It seems that graduate students have jobs at Sovereign Hill, but all they get is a graduate degree certificate, while it is the owners of Sovereign Hill, including Croft and Callan, who receive the "added economic value." There is one exception: UMass, which owns 5 percent of Sovereign Hill, receives no royalties. However, is it a University's place to be providing venture capital for corporations, or should its priority be in providing education on a democratic basis? How does this corporate capitalistic philosophy affect the level of education which students receive?

One may wonder why the UMass capital spending plan for 1996-2001 includes $35.5 million for a new computer science center when there are fewer than 50 graduates of the computer science program each year. Perhaps this is because UMass realizes that its future lies with its "spinoff corporations" and not with its students.

Grad student supports GEO

To the Editor:

After reading Sean Werle's letter in the April 13 Collegian, I would like to respond to his call for a lawsuit against the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) over agency fee. In his letter, Werle challenges graduate employees to support a lawsuit. This is absolutely unnecessary and counterproductive to the tasks at hand. His time and energy would be better utilized helping GEO to ensure that the UMass administration implements our newly ratified contract in a timely fashion so all graduate employees could enjoy its many benefits, including our raises and retroactive pay.

The GEO contract ratified on March 26, 1998 provides a range of benefits, both monetary and otherwise, which aid all graduate employees on this campus. Although not all graduate employees recognize what GEO does for them, they still receive the benefits of each negotiated contract and have for the last seven years. GEO has secured and protects a number of monetary benefits which far exceed agency fee, including tuition, curriculum, health and work related e-mail waivers among many other benefits. I am one of over 60 percent of graduate employees who voluntarily pay their union dues. While Werle claims that agency fee is "unfair," it seems unfair to me that a greater number of graduate employees do not pay their share towards the benefits we all receive.

Campus mail is no help

To the Editor:

Could someone please answer a question for me? How does Campus Mail work? I received two "reminders" in the mail the other day. One was for room reservation and the other was for an appointment at Health Services. It is good to know UMass takes the time to remind students of important dates, but these notices showed up in my box after the date they were intended to remind me about. Fortunately, I am not reserving my room, so the fact that it came a day too late didn't hurt me. I also remembered my doctor's appointment on my own, so that notice showing up six days late didn't hurt either.

I appreciate all these "reminders" UMass sends out, but why can't they show up on time? Is campus mail really this slow? What is the point of sending out a birthday reminder from housing if it shows up a month after my birthday? I don't want to make a big deal about the whole thing, but I just don't see the logic. My phone bill, also sent through campus mail, showed up the day before it was due for two consecutive months. One of these days I might miss something really important, and find the "reminder" in the mail two days later.

Too cute to resist

Seema Gangatirkar

It started with the Teeny Beanies at McDonalds and soon, Colleen Sullivan, a home dance and communications major at the University of Massachusetts, had amassed a collection of approximately 126 Beanie Babies.

"All my friends think I'm obsessed," Sullivan said.

"Obsessed" might be a good way to describe the Beanie Baby phenomenon sweeping the country. The Oct. 21, 1996 issue of Forbes Magazine refers the mad dash for Beanies as "A frenzy. The marketing according while Richard Gernady of The Cat's Meow "Beanies may become the biggest thing ever to Elvis, Sinatra and The Beatles combined."

The tiny, plush toys, which retail in stores for around $5 new, can be worth thousands of dollars if retired, mint condition Beanie — with tag attached.

"They are worth more with the tags," Sullivan according to Sullivan, misprints make a Beanie more valuable and retiring one of these toys also adds value to the Beanie Baby.

Beanie Babies, manufactured by the TY company, [illegible] raised in order to get her [illegible] Last summer, Sullivan and her [illegible] starting at 6 a.m. for up to three [illegible] hours.

"[illegible] people," Sullivan said.

[illegible] elementary education major, [illegible] people," Cogan said. "All [illegible] Beanies] is a real- [illegible] people."

Cogan's interest in Beanie Babies grew [illegible] done by McDonald's last summer [illegible] offered Teeny Beanies in [illegible].

"[illegible] really cute," Cogan said. Her collection [illegible] of the toys.

Cogan can visit the TY Company website for information [illegible] Beanies.

"[TY] puts on new ones and announces when they retire the old one. They retire and announce the new ones on the same day," Cogan said.

Cogan also checks the guest book on the site to see if there are any Beanies available to sell or trade.

Hughes contrasts the Beanie Baby phenomenon with the earlier, lukewarm response to the stuffed animals.

"The really early ones, you couldn't give away," Hughes said. But that all changed with the advent of Righty the Elephant and Lefty the Donkey, two Beanies dedicated to the Republicans and Democrats. Those Beanies were snatched up as soon as they hit the shelves and since their retirement in 1996, Righty and Lefty are valued between $400 and $750, depending on their condition. Spot the Dog, if missing, its sale price, is valued between $1,500 and $2,000. Also on the most wanted list are Legs the Frog, Squealer the Pig and Derby the Bear — all selling between $1,700 and $2,500.

But for Cogan, who says her Beanie Babies are taking over her room, doesn't really worry about tag protectors.

"I'm not really in it for the money," Cogan said.

Lemmon, Matthau are back

Odd Couple 2 tells the story of aging with dignity & humanely

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

THE ODD COUPLE 2
Directed by Howard Deutch
with Jack Lemmon, Walter Matthau, Jonathan Silverman
Playing at Hampshire Mall Cinemas

COURTESY M-W-WALLACE

Walter Matthau reunites with Jack Lemmon in The Odd Couple 2.

Jack Lemmon and Walter Matthau reprise their roles as the spectacularly mismatched "couple" Felix and Oscar in this sequel to The Odd Couple that bears a more important resemblance to their recent series of comedies than to the source movie. All their "geezer" comedies (Grumpy Old Men, Grumpier Old Men, Out to Sea) have together aroused the same amount of critical enthusiasm as a head cold, but they deserve at least a little of our collective love. Granted, there is a great deal about these movies to hate. The movies often stoop to cliche and stereotype, and long stretches of writing are just plain sloppy, but when they hit it right, Lemmon and Matthau are the sarcastic grandpas we've always wanted.

The plot in The Odd Couple 2 is unimportant. It's something about children getting married, which would be fine, except one of the children has the bad luck to be played by Jonathan Silverman, one of the worst "comic" actors ever. He's both cloying and soulless and has the timing of dirt. Consequently, all the marriage stuff is obvious and boring. Thankfully, most of the movie centers on Lemmon and Matthau lost in California, nowhere near their unfunny child.

The movie was scripted by Neil Simon, which tells us right away to expect reams and reams of rapid fire humor with more corn than Iowa. It's easy to dismiss the corny jokes as just bad writing, but Simon puts in so many of them is overwhelming. The density of bad jokes is so great it is impressive, like a really big booger. It's like getting drunk and watching "Saved by the Bell" and wondering why that Screech guy never won an Emmy.

Simon and his stars have such a mad conviction that jokes about bladder control and toupees are funny that, after awhile, they are. Of course, most of the humor comes from the delivery. Both Lemmon and Matthau seem a beat too slow, which only makes things funnier. You can almost sense them struggling to hit the lines right. Comedy is a battle here, but it is a battle worth fighting and worth watching.

These geezer comedies deserve notice not only because they are occasionally funny (ex: the hornball Great-Grandpa in Grumpy Old Men) but because they deal with aging in a surprisingly honest and humane way. Older people are usually confined to the fringes of movies as parents and mentors, but they are allowed to take center stage here. Lemmon and Matthau deserve both credit and mad props simply for telling stories about an underrepresented movie population.

Further, Lemmon and Matthau don't try to mask their sagging bodies, they use their brittleness for laughs and are perfectly willing to look ridiculous doing it. They bicker not with the logic and wit of adults, like stereotypical wisemen, but like overgrown children, which is, technically, what we all are, and maybe what we want to be. There is a very strong sense of the absurdity of dignity, aging and life in general that runs through their movies. In The Odd Couple 2, Felix and Oscar don't show up at their children's wedding to stoically look on, they instead end up in a small-town motel wearing glow-in-the-dark boxer shorts.

To this absurdity is added a sense of desperation. It seems like in all their movies, someone says "This could be the last time..." There is only one more chance to get the girl, one more convoluted practical joke. Life is weird, silly and disappointing, these movies show us, and there is never enough of it.

As far as The Odd Couple 2 goes on its individual merits, it is pretty uneven. The scenes without Lemmon and Matthau together have the same vibrant energy as a stapler. But when Lemmon and Matthau are together, most everything can be forgiven. At the movie's close, when Felix's last chance at romance fails, he shows up at Oscar's door like a lost puppy. In the end, all they have is their friendship and the memories of the roads they've traveled, paved with bad jokes and affectionate sarcasm. These movies make fun of romance, old age and family life just as ferociously as Lemmon and Matthau's characters rip at each other. In this case, mocking is the sincerest form of flattery. C+

Jazz to be celebrated at Bowker

By Emily Trask

COURTESY FINE ARTS CENTER

Art Farmer will perform A Great Day in Harlem tonight at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium.

A unique evening of film and jazz is in store for jazz lovers and film buffs alike when the Fine Arts Center Series presents A Great Day in Harlem, tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium.

Kicking off this event, there will be a showing of the documentary film A Great Day in Harlem, which chronicles the taking of the infamous photograph by Art Kane.

In 1958, Kane was invited to contribute to a special jazz issue of Esquire magazine. Although Kane was considered one of New York's hottest young magazine art directors, he had not yet taken a professional photograph. However, he conceived the idea of an all-encompassing group shot "of everybody," and put the word out for all jazz musicians in New York to meet him uptown at 10 a.m. one summer morning — and exceptionally early hour for jazz musicians, who are used to finishing up to dawn.

Kane was surprised that anyone showed up at all. Word of mouth had prevailed, and Dizzy Gillespie, Charles Mingus, Thelonious Monk, Count Basie, Art Blakey, Lester Young, Coleman Hawkins, Gerry Mulligan, Sonny Rollins, Art Farmer, Marian McPartland, Maxine Sullivan, Milt Hinton, and dozens of others actually got there, and a valuable document was born. The photograph appeared several months later on two pages of Esquire and made history.

Produced by Jean Bach and narrated by Quincy Jones, the film and the photo that it inspired displays a wide array of people and documents the evolution of jazz from its beginnings up to the avant-garde. The film uses conversations with and about the various jazz stars pictured, archival performance footage, and some never-before-seen home movie footage, filmed by Milt Hinton (which is a combination of the two). Now Farmer's trademark, the "flumpet" combines the dark, lustrous sound quality of the flugelhorn with the bright edge of the trumpet. This unique instrument was developed specially for him by master brass craftsman David Monette. Farmer's quintet for this performance will include Ron Blake, saxophone, Ted Rosenthal, piano, Kenny Davis, bass, and Yoron Israel, drums.

Tickets for this concert are $20 and $15. Tickets for children 17 and under are $8, and tickets for Five College students are $5. For tickets or more information call (413) 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS. A Great Day in Harlem is part of the Fine Arts Center's Black Musicians Festival. Call (413) 545-3530 for a complete schedule and his wife Mona, to capture the atmosphere of the day that is encapsulated in that one picture.

The second half of the program will consist of a live concert performed by the legendary trumpet player Art Farmer and his Quintet. They will be playing standards by some of the jazz greats, in addition to playing Farmer's own compositions.

During the span of his 40 year career, Farmer has produced over 100 recordings and has performed with some of the greatest jazz artists of all time, including Benny Carter, Dexter Gordon, Lionel Hampton, Quincy Jones, Lester Young, Thelonious Monk, Charles Mingus and Art Blakey.

Farmer's facility and emotional depth have been said to be "unmatched" on the trumpet, flugelhorn, and the "flumpet"

Squirrel Nut Zippers try out same old formula in NoHo

ALEXANDER KORONKEVICH

Squirrel Nut Zippers played at Smith on Tuesday.

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

SQUIRREL NUT ZIPPERS / BIO NITMO / THE AMAZING ROYAL CROWNS
John M. Greene Hall
April 14

NORTHAMPTON — The three acts that shared the bill at Smith College's John M. Greene Hall Tuesday night were each like a piece of Bubble Yum. Sure, it's tasty as hell and bursting with flavor for the first 15 minutes, but after that, it gets stale pretty fast. Such is an inherent problem when musicians attempt to imitate rather than innovate.

Still, Squirrel Nut Zippers, Bio Nitmo and The Amazing Royal Crowns put on an enjoyable show that emphasized style over musical substance. Each band actually seemed to be merely a medium for transmitting the feel-good sounds of swinging jazz, taking the crowd back to an era in music long since past. While there is nothing wrong with the notion of imitation being the sincerest form of flattery, none of the bands were able to move past interpreting their idols.

As far as recreating the swinging jazz of the early part of the century, the Squirrel Nut Zippers are ace imitators, all the way down to their authentic outfits — albeit with a minimum of sophistication. Their attack wasn't nearly varied enough to warrant any real comparisons the greats of the genre. They did have their moments, though.

"Bad Businessman" sounded like a sublime ode to Bourbon Street during Mardi Gras with Katharine Whalen's Peggy Lee voice rising above some bloozy horns. Also impressive was "Put A Lid On It" which presented the band as the earnest interpreters they really are.

Making their Valley debut, the nine members of Richmond, VA's Bio Nitmo played an entertaining mix of Latin-tinged jazz, complete with a blaring horn section and choreographed dance moves. "What I Want to Say" showed why their inventive method of layering syncopated percussion works like a drug to get a crowd up and dancing. On "I'm As Happy As Could Be," the band took their cue from the timeless lounge stylings of Burt Bacharach and ran with it.

Opening the show was the Amazing Royal Crowns. Coming off like a cross between the Mighty Mighty Bosstones and the Stray Cats, the local rockabilly outfit thrashed around earnest, but ultimately hollow songs including "Do The Devil." Their Dicky Barrett–wannabe lead singer did an admirable job of getting a sparse crowd involved, although their formula could use some variation.

Connick's latest a dreary attempt

"Fame L.A." soundtrack fails to live up to its predecessor

TO SEE YOU
Harry Connick Jr.
Columbia

It might have seemed like a good idea in the beginning to combine a string orchestra with a jazz quartet and create an album of music dedicated to love.

Unfortunately, on Harry Connick Jr.'s To See You, orchestra and jazz become a dreary combination and rather than feeling romantic, the music immediately transports the listener into a waiting room type atmosphere.

Nowhere is this mood more prominent than on the opening track, "Let Me Love Tonight." At 10 minutes in length, "Let Me Love Tonight" is an exercise in tedium as the ballad goes on and on, making one glad of the fast-forward button. After a dull orchestral introduction, Connick's voice melds seductively around the music, trying to breath some life into the song. The lyrics, such as "Come good fortune/Let me love tonight/Pardon me from soulless searching/Spare for another with a see-through heart" are less than captivating and sound downright desperate. Probably the strongest part of the opening track comes when, to the listener's relief, Connick actually stops singing and lets the jazz quartet play alone.

Connick fails to ditch the muzak with the album's second track, "To See You." No jazz quartet here, but rather it's all about the orchestra playing without any significant movement. You have to reach the fourth track before any element of spirit enters into this album. In "Heart Beyond Repair," the jazz quartet is back, sprightly and more energetic than any of the other previous songs. Like "Let Me Love Tonight," "Heart Beyond Repair" shines more for its composition than lyrics or singing.

Connick's lyrics tend to border on the mushy side to the point that it is almost painful to listen. On "Once," Connick sings "Once it all I need to show you love making is an art/But once–made love won't be nearly enough once/I win your heart." Along with the downright sickeningly sweet lyrics, Connick overuses the word "love" (it is present in almost every song title) to the point where it feels necessary to buy the man a thesaurus. And Connick also has a strange idea of what a love song might sound like; on "Love Me Some You," the words "So kill me/I love me some you" just don't set the right mood. This is the type of album that even if you were having sex, you'd fall asleep out of boredom.

Musically, Connick does well when he ignores the orchestra and concentrates on what he does best: jazz. But for an album meant to be romantic, the sheer dreariness of To See You makes it impossible to love. F (Seema Gangatirkar)

WICKED CITY SOUNDTRACK
Various Artists
Velvel\Gypsy

At first glance this appears to be a hardcore kids fantasy. The soundtrack for the independently released Wicked City, features all New York hardcore and punk bands. By the way, the movie is about a girl trying to live in New York's Lower East Side. The album features H2O, Killing Time, CIV, Orange 9MM, Shift, Samsara, Shades Apart, Pry, Demonspeed, Sweet Diesel, Moses, Mephiskapheles, Home 33 and Choking Victim.

I know you're psyched right, too bad chances are you already have all the songs. H2O does "5 Year Plan," CIV does "So Far, So Good, So What," Orange 9MM does "Sacrifice," Killing Time does "Outgroup," Shift does "Dress Up," getting the picture yet. Sure the songs are great, and if you don't have them then you should, but it could be so much better if it was unreleased or at least more obscure tracks.

Television & the art of censorship, the latest on "South Park"

Last week was a good time for TV movies! The Ten Commandments, the ultimate Easter tradition was shown on ABC this weekend. Regardless of how many times people had actually seen the film, it still pulled in huge ratings for the network. It's always been a mystery to me why anyone watches movies on television and especially those awful made for TV movies. I guess saying this is a bit hypocritical since I know that I have watched them before. However, if you watch one of these movies, chances are that you aren't getting what was ever intended to be shown due to countless editing and censorship.

As a strong fighter of censorship, I can honestly say that I get annoyed every time I hear anything censored. That could ranged from changing an actors' cursing to something like "eat my shorts," to the notorious "bleeping" on the "Jerry Springer Show." Censorship plays such a major role in any movie that is shown on regular television that it could be the main reason that pay cable was invented. There was nearly half an hour deleted from The Ten Commandments this weekend, due to time problems involving the local news. If something is cut so much, how can viewers get the chance to see everything that was supposed to be shown? Furthermore, at 11 p.m., why do the networks need to edit some of these movies? Are there really people out there that would be offended by someone saying "ass" a few hours after prime time? It's one thing to censor a movie that a child could turn on and hear really poor choice language, but in some cases it's just not necessary.

For instance, this Sunday night I was watching one of my favorite movies of all time on the USA network. My Cousin Vinny was being shown, and anyone who has ever seen this film knows that there are many things about it that are not suitable for children. For this, the company chose to edit practically the entire movie. I was amazed that they couldn't cram this abbreviated version into a half an hour. The answer is simple here. If a movie is so controversial that you have to delete half of it, just don't show it on TV. People who have VCRs can go to the video store and rent My Cousin Vinny for about a $1. It's not exactly a new release! The problem is that these networks desperately want to show these movies on television, but they're so afraid to leave anything in the movie that could offend anyone.

I guess the root of this problem is that no matter what you put on TV, it's definitely going to offend someone! It's just too bad that we can't look past these things, and devise a way to allow people to see a movie in its entirety without being afraid that someone will object.

There's one thing I'm sure of though; made for TV movies are not the answer! I think there's about a million of these a year, and if we can find one that is even close to watchable, it's just good luck. The topic of these things are usually completely ridiculous, and not worth anyone's time. The last one that I can remember watching was a horrible knock-off of Twister something about an asteroid hitting the earth (I think it was actually called Asteroid, but I'm not sure). The target audience is generally soap opera watchers so networks try to use the same type of plots and try to write scripts that people will think are interesting. However, these movies never compare to the quality of soaps, and thus an avid soap watcher will not even give these things the time of day.

If there's anyplace where you can find quality made for TV movies that are not edited, it must be on HBO. HBO original films are usually very good, and a lot of work is put into making quality entertainment. Unfortunately, HBO is a pay channel, and it costs something to enjoy these movies. I guess for now we're going to have to suffer through these TV movies, or turn them off.

If anyone was home this weekend you may have had the chance to watch Matchbox 20 play on MTV's Live at the Ten Spot. Matchbox 20, which is set to play May 27 at the Mullins Center, put on an excellent show that I'm sure was touched up for MTV, but it was still enough to convince me to come back to school a week after school ends to see the concert.

Barbara Streisand has a thing or two to say about television these days.

"I wonder if shows like 'South Park' and 'Beavis and Butthead' don't add to the cynicism and negativity in our culture, especially in children," Streisand says in next month's Mirabella. The diva, who was portrayed as an egomaniacal mechanical monster in a February "South Park" episode, claims that she wasn't even aware of the show "until I read in Time magazine that they had used me in a negative way."

Much like tabloid newspapers, it looks like "South Park" is going to have to watch what they say otherwise celebrities will start to defend themselves, and that could cause a problem for the creators.

In other "South Park" news, I've talked to a very reliable source that happens to be an employee at Comedy Central. He claims that the April 22 episode that is supposed to reveal the identity of Eric Cartman's father will not be a hoax again. The last time this claim was made, viewers endured a 30-minute long Terence and Phillip as an April Fool's day gag. Furthermore, this Comedy Central source said that if a betting system were to be devised about who Cartman's father actually is, the top choice right now would be Mr. Garrison. He said, "for some reason Comedy Central and the creators of 'South Park' feel that the school teacher would be a perfect choice, so if I was a betting man, I'd put my money on him." We'll just have to wait one more week to find out the truth.

Finally, as the countdown to the last episode of "Seinfeld" has been filmed, and the last scene was filmed, "audience free" and is being kept top secret. "Seinfeld" had its worst ratings of the season. The reason for this is unknown by NBC, but all they know is that "Seinfeld," which usually has over 30 million viewers had just under 29 million. I'm sure NBC is not worried because when the final episode is aired in May, it is sure to be one of, if not the most watched episode of any sitcom in the history of television.

John Hammond covers a who's who list of idols on upcoming new release

On April 21, Pointblank will release John Hammond's latest, Long As I Have You, a CD made up of 15 songs from a who's who of blues greats.

Just as Eric Clapton did on 1995's From The Cradle, Hammond covers the work of his idols, playing the songs of such legendary figures as Howlin' Wolf, Sonny Boy Williamson, Willie Dixon, Little Walter, T-Bone Walker, Blind Boy Fuller, Eddie Taylor and Jimmy Rodgers.

Hammond has been on the blues scene for 35 years, and his last three releases, Found True Love, Trouble No More and Got Love If You Want It, have all been Grammy nominees. On this one, he is backed on the first 12 tracks by Little Charlie & The Nightcats, who feature the underrated Charlie Baty on guitar and some bad-ass harmonica from Rick Estrin.

The set's opener, Sonny Boy Williamson's, "Don't Start Me Talkin'," with Estrin featured, is just a flat-out solid bit of blues that continues on every other track on the album. Not to put down Clapton, but Hammond sings with the soul needed to do these songs justice and his musical backing is electric blues, not blues rock — he captures more of the music's spirit and the bluesman's spirit than Clapton ever could.

"Goin' Away Baby" is done in such a way with stripped down, jumpy percussion and rustling harmonica riffs so that the illusion of riding away on a train is very evident — this is a near-perfect work of art. Baty displays some of the hardest, dirtiest, most percussive blues guitar that doesn't sound like rock 'n roll since before 1955 on Otis Rush's "So Many Roads, So Many Trains."

"Crying At Daylight" sounds a lot like Howlin' Wolf's, "Smokestack Lightning," mostly because it is that song, under a different name with a few slightly different lyrics. Nailing the trademark vocal howls and moans, Hammond and the band do a great job of preserving the down home sound on this one.

COURTESY THIRD RAIL RELEASE

John Hammond pays homage to some of his idols on his latest release

J. J. Cale, who has produced Clapton's "Cocaine" and "After Midnight," produced the final three tracks, and they are unreal

Changing the format with Hammond singing, playing guitar and harmonica with Washboard Chaz Leary on washboard, "Untrue Blues" is pure backwoods sound, while "Tell Me Mama" and the hazy, frustrated "Homeless Blues" allow for some wailing on the harp as Leary stutters percussion washboard style.

Whether or not it's because Hammond is that good of a blues-man or just because these songs bring it out in him, it doesn't matter. This is a recording that captures the spirit of the blues completely.

Cynthia Greary returns to television

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — It is sweet to learn that Cynthia Geary has never quite left Cicely, Alaska.

Geary, of course, spent five years as waitress Shelly Tambo on "Northern Exposure," the delectably quirky comedy-drama set in that one-moose town. Roslyn, Wash., subbed as the mythical Cicely. Its interiors were shot in Seattle, where Geary took up residence. "Northern Exposure" ended in 1995, but Geary stayed on. And only in the past few months was she ready for the weekly Los Angeles commute another series would entail.

The show that spirited her away is titled, aptly enough, "You're the One," a sitcom premiering Sunday at 9:30 p.m. EDT on the WB.

This time, her character is Lindsay, a vivacious Southern belle who marries Mark, an offbeat Jewish guy from Long Island, played by comedian Elon Gold. As they set up house in Manhattan, they will face their own cultural clashes, as well as their in-laws'.

"You're the One" is a little bit "Mad About You," a little bit "Dharma & Greg." But more to the point, it's a lot Cynthia Geary, who's always a treat whether she's lighting up a TV screen, or sipping coffee at her Manhattan hotel during a recent visit. For the mid-morning interview, Geary presents herself in the dining room wearing jeans and sweat shirt and no make-up, her blond hair combed out wet. Up for hours, she has already had room-service breakfast.

"How can raisin bran and coffee be $37?" she marvels, the query of someone who during "Northern Exposure" lived on her per diem while investing her salary.

Such frugality gave Geary freedom in what she chose to do next.

"I was excited about the character of Lindsay," she says, explaining her choice of "You're the One."

"It was a leading lady role, which I felt I was ready for, and I thought I could bring a lot to it, because I knew the character so well."

Why not? She's a native of Jackson, Miss., who got hitched to a fellow who grew up in Malibu.

"My roommate in L.A. set us up on a blind date. He lived with her boyfriend. We ended up getting married. They broke up."

The meeting was a decade ago, as Geary unwittingly prepared herself for her future role as Shelly. She was working as a waitress.

"A very poor waitress," she says, meaning both inept and broke. "But I had a good personality, and people felt sorry for me."

Noticed her, anyway. In fact, it was while waitressing at a Mexican restaurant in Beverly Hills that Geary got a personal manager. Maybe it was thanks to her square jaw and iridescent, slightly skewed smile. Maybe it was the big bright eyes and the eager look of almost constant surprise.

Maybe it was the free flan.

"It was her husband's birthday," says Geary, "and I gave him a flan. She signed me and put me with a good agent, and three months later I'm on a hit show."

But not before getting fired from the restaurant.

"It was because I missed work so many times going to the 'Northern Exposure' call-backs. By the time I got the role, I was working at an Italian restaurant."

That was one of many good things about "Northern Exposure": It meant no more waiting tables, just pretending to.

The bad thing: "I hung up the phone and started crying because I had just met the most wonderful guy and was madly in love."

Of course, that all worked out. Soon Robert Coron moved his real estate investment business to Seattle. Two years ago, he and Geary were wed.

Devoted Seattleites, they water ski and drink lots of lattes. Sometimes they catch "Northern Exposure" reruns on A&E (weekdays at noon and 6 p.m. EDT). And in the yard of their home is a garden, where Geary unwittingly prepared herself for her future role as Lindsay — by profession, a landscape architect.

But Geary, who says she hadn't been to Manhattan in years, didn't know squat about her character's city. When asked the address of the apartment Lindsay is supposed to be sharing with Mark, Geary looks stricken. She hasn't a clue.

"I never went to Alaska when I was doing 'Northern Exposure,'" she adds — "not until this February, to Alyeska on a ski trip." Now she resolves to phone her new show's producer, who when she does will remind her that the Weitzes live on West 90th Street. That's just 30 blocks up Central Park from her hotel. Geary has a few hours before her return flight to L.A. There's only one thing to do.

"I'm gonna go out," she declares, "and find where my apartment is."

Elsewhere in television... is it happening more and more these days — teachers accused of sexually abusing the students they're supposed to protect? Studies show that many schools aren't prepared to deal with such affairs, and that, even worse, school officials look the other way or just hope the problem will disappear. "48 Hours: Teacher's Pet" takes viewers behind the stories of several teacher-student sexual relationships, and examines why this serious problem occurs. "48 Hours" is tonight at 10 p.m. EDT on CBS. Dan Rather anchors.

The biggest surprise is Moses with the best song on the album "Spotted Horse." Moses features one of the best female vocalists in hardcore and should have a full length out. Sweet Diesel are a close second with "Kid In This Town" and "I Hate The Man." Samsara and Choking Victim make debut appearances, but I don't see any rush requesting follow-ups.

The idea behind this album is a great one, to expose the sounds of the Lower East Side to the world. It's just that it could have been so much better. B (Adam Dugnez)

FOUR-MINUTE MILE
The Get-Up Kids
Doghouse

Emo is a genre that is seriously in danger of running aground, beached by its own cliches and rules. Done right, it's an exciting, emotional (hence the name), release, based on catharsis and raw feeling. See the Promise Ring, for example, or Braid. But emo also seems to swim in it's own pretensions and this could get old real quick. The problem is, you can almost feel, while listening to it, the music teetering on the edge of the abyss, much like the Grinch's sled.

Here are two bands, on the same label, that come from two sides the emo spectrum. The Get-Up Kids play poppy and brash, the music full of harmonics and the occasional tempo change, singing about girls and families they've left behind. The Hot Water Music Band play louder and heavier, a slap in the face that is closer to hardcore, but light enough to fall under the vague tag of emo.

I must say that I enjoy both of these albums, but listening to them almost makes me realize that this is a genre at the end of the road. Enjoy it while you can.

The Get-Up Kids have the better album. It's just more fun, and it's infectious. This is what carries the album. Listen to the keyboard squiggles and the stop/start rhythm of the second track, "Don't Hate Me." Every song builds to a catharsis that is almost draining. What takes away from the album are the self-serving lyrics. Most seem to be whiny and cloying, either asking for forgiveness or rationalizing why they've started a band. It's the post-modern album: intensely aware of itself, but to a flaw. Come on, guys, just rock out. There needs to be more growth, especially in the lyrics, in the next album for these guys to be any good.

The Hot Water Music Band's Forever and Counting is an intense, moody and heavy collection of songs that contains a deep sense of melody, though coupled with a bruising sound. It just doesn't catch fire, at least with me. The best song, "Better Sense," comes early, and it's close to a letdown after that. I have to give mention to the bass playing — it's playful and imaginative, but never threatens to overtake the songs. Four-Minute Mile — A-: Forever and Counting — B (Mike Messaros)

FAME L.A. SOUNDTRACK
Various Artists
Mercury

I started listening to this CD with the most positive outlook a person could have. I was optimistic on the basis that I adore the original "Fame." I should have known better. Sequels are never equal to the original, and neither are the soundtracks.

Fame L.A. starts off with an uplifting, go-get-em type of song by Molly Rebekka. Not so bad yet. Next comes a pretty cool melody by Heidi Noelle Lenhart which is a song that can easily get one too optimistic for the rest of the CD. She's got a great voice that is sweet and mature. The rest of the CD goes downhill from there. The group 98 shows off their vocal ability by trying to mimic Boyz II Men. They come off sounding cheesy and sappy. Blush picks up the beat with "City of Angels."

The rest of the CD continues with slow sappy music. It gives a good attempt at being uplifting, but it just isn't working. It's dominated by Heidi Noelle Lenhart and Brent David Frasier. They would have been better off sticking to one song a piece. It ends with Irene Cara singing the original version of "Fame" that we all love an adore. At least that song wasn't too cheesy.

Unfortunately, Fame L.A. only fuels the rumor that sequels are never as good as the original. C- (Gena Mavuli)

BANG OUT OF ORDER
Bond
Work

This album is so 1997. I mean, Sugar Ray blazed the trail these guys are riding on right now. And what a trail it is.

With this album, we see the problem of being different. Put on horn-rimmed glasses and a shoulder bag and pow! You're indie. Add a few computer sounds to an album and you're "electronica-influenced." But as always, it's all style, no substance.

Bond attempts to apply light-weight electronica to straight up rock and roll, and you know what? It's starting to get just a bit annoying. I mean, how many more bands do we need trying to do this? It really doesn't work.

In all fairness, Bang Out the Order, does have it's moments. The music can be bouncy and low grade entertaining, but for the most part, this album isn't anything you're going to write home about. In the end, bad lyrics and vocals do it in. In fact, the lyrics are awful. On the lead-off track, "Starbucked," you expect some observations on the buying and selling of America, but what you get is some boneheaded sexuality that the Red Hot Chili Peppers would laugh at. "Her gasm is in ore/ My balls are in her court." What!? That doesn't even make sense! It's not clever in the least. In fact, the whole album revels in bad puns, sexual or not. "Don't take a fall for Santa's clause/ His terms are not so legal." vocalist Steve Eusebe sings in "Miracles." OK, man, knock it off. And for 11 songs at 43:33, there's only so much you can take.

The album has some good parts. "Anne Grenade" rocks, but just look at the title. "I'm a Bastard," is also good, and the vocals are muffled and distorted, which in this case is a definite plus. D (M.M.)

Jennifur Brandt has the latest on fashion, music

By Francine Parnes
Associated Press

To publish a hip Los Angeles fanzine like Pesky Meddling Girls, it takes a girl with these assets: hot-pink-and-leopard-print bedroom decor, '50s glass cat collection and really cool name. That girl is Jennifur Brandt, who closes her letters with "Love and liquid liner," lives with her parents and sister in North Hollywood, and says movies from the past are her window to tracking future trends.

Her room is filled with mounds of collage art that she sells under the name Jennifurniture, that glass cat collection and oodles of poodles. Porcelain poodles. Poodle clock. Poodle bubble bath. Poodle magazine stand.

An entire wall of books pays tribute to old Hollywood, a source for her retro-ridden 'zine.

"Sometimes I don't know when to quit, when it comes to wearing pink and fuzzy clothes and angora. People could find me kind of nauseating," Brandt says.

Brandt, 22, has been publishing Pesky Meddling Girls for five years from her home. Her 'zine counts trendy fashion designer Anna Sui, The Wallflowers and Marilyn Manson among its 300 subscribers. Likewise, Warner Bros. and Disney use her publication to tap into what's hot in music, fashion and makeup.

Here's a sample: "Toys attached to your skirt, butterflies on your head ... it's what I really hope teen-age girls will wear after the millennium."

Really?

"Jennifur has her finger on the pulse of a lot of pop culture trends," says Michelyn Camen, vice president for Steve Madden, the funky footwear designer. "In many ways, she anticipates things before the marketers do."

Like, maybe, dress shirts for little boys paired with ties and argyle socks?

Brandt says they just might be the next big thing... For girls like her, anyway.

"I'll see an '80s movie and say, 'it's time for that to come back,'" she says. "I go back in time and just get vibes, like I want this to come back now. Like it's time for women to wear snoods again."

But blink and that time will pass.

"Every day is a different era with me, depending on what music I'm into at that time, which always changes. Or if I saw a really good '60s movie the night before, I'll have an insatiable urge to wear hip-huggers or bell bottoms."

Then comes the week of wearing '40s clothes.

"It's a really high-mainienance week. It takes time to do pin curls and wear the heels. And you have to walk slow."

Brandt and her 19-year-old sister Lizzie, who shouts photographs for the 'zine and other joint projects, recently snagged an assignment with Steve Madden. They created an eight-page brochure for Seventeen magazine. And it was Jennifur who modeled as "Alice" in a hyper-real world she created called "Maddenland." But at 5 feet 5 inches, Brandt says she's not exactly mannequin material. For the Steve Madden project, "I kind of medltated to fit into all the clothes."

It does take some work to be the girl known as Jennifur Brandt. It means getting up around 9 a.m. and spending two hours getting ready to face your public.

But why venture out when your bedroom is filled with animal-print pillows and bedspread — even feral wallpaper? "It's pretty overwhelming in here," she admits.

Brandt is ambitious. She's started an ad agency, Pesky Meddling Media. She wants a Pesky Meddling Girls clothing line. She wants a talk show.

"I know it's obnoxious and everybody's trying to do it," she says. "But I feel I could be the girly Conan."

Besides, Brandt already has the stage presence.

"My motto is always in my 'zine," she says. "It's 'life is a movie starring you.' I want every day to have a happy ending. And a really good plot. But not too much drama."

and complex defensive schemes will be difficult to read at first, as they are for most incoming quarterbacks.

Manning will bring his father's toughness to the field, as he did in college. He's not likely to get down on himself too much after he's knocked to the ground, because he brings an experienced balance to the game, both physically and mentally. Peyton's dad, Archie, had his share of knocks with the Saints, Oilers and Vikings and made sure his son was prepared for that aspect of the game.

One of the greatest quarterbacks to ever play the game, Archie Manning also instilled a strong work ethic in his son and the result has been the fierce competitor we see today. Manning's motivation could be seen in the classroom as well, as he graduated in three years with honors.

Although he could have very easily won the Heisman Award last year and certainly had the season that deserved it, Manning refused to get a chip on his shoulder. Instead he demonstrated the poise and dignity that will be sure to get him far at the next level.

Where Leaf mistakes arrogance and obnoxious behavior for confidence and being suave, Manning commands the respect he has earned and carries it onto the playing field. Leaf is also behind Manning in the mental aspect of the game, as he takes unnecessary sacks and can become quite inconsistent at times. The Volunteer has also shown he can find those key second and third receivers better than Leaf, something that will be vital come their rookie seasons.

Leaf can be very streaky at times and his accuracy is not as good as Manning's. It is Manning's consistency that will get him far in the league and possibly rejuvenate a franchise. Being around coaches his whole life has set Manning up for success, as he become adept at utilizing his abilities efficiently.

While some may give Leaf the edge in 'toughness' simply because he weighs more than Manning and beats his own chest from time to time, It was Manning that came back to play in the Orange Bowl after injuring his knee in the SEC championship game against Auburn. Manning was hospitalized after the infection spread all the way down to his ankle, but said he would be back and was.

Manning finished the season completing over 60 percent of his passes despite being flushed out of the pocket many times due to a young line, Manning would eventually lead Tennessee to the SEC championship after connecting on 36 touchdowns and only 11 interceptions.

His rise to stardom has come about because Manning is a student of the game. He knows how to lead. He knows what it takes. Manning has the ability to overcome, and that will certainly be tested as soon as he gets to the NFL. He has done that throughout his life with his dedication to the game and has showed that he truly has the charisma all great quarterbacks have.

Jamie Lee is a Collegian columnist.

■ Leaf

situations is quick to scramble and locate an opposing cornerback. Leaf at times seems unstoppable. The reason this becomes a problem for Manning is because he will probably be playing in Indy and the Colts gave up a league-leading 62 sacks last year, which means Peyton better learn to play under pressure

Where these two athletes equal out is in delivery, both need coaching at the position. Neither quarterback is very mobile, neither of these guys will win games running the ball, but they don't have to because they're not running backs. If one of them had to win a game running the ball, let's say a game like the Super Bowl, the way John Elway helped do, the more durable Leaf would have more success.

The pocket is a hot place to play in the NFL, and remember Manning had a tough time playing against tough college defenses that collapsed the pocket quickly. Leaf, on the other hand was a steady pocket player, he even played a strong game in the pocket against co-champion Michigan. Leaf showed his nerves of steel and his endurance in that game, and his never-give-up attitude.

When Leaf goes to San Diego he will have two pretty good coaches concentrating on just him, Kevin Gilbride and June Jones. Gilbride has coached stars such as Warren Moon, Mark Brunell and has another potential great in Leaf.

Ryan Leaf also has youth and excitement, which will provide a great boost to an already excited San Diego team. He has a great core of receivers, such as Tony Martin, Charlie Jones and a superstar at running back in the form of Natrone Means.

The final points include the fact that Peyton Manning was born to choke. He never beat Florida and he lost big games such as Nebraska in the Orange Bowl and Penn State two years ago in the Fiesta Bowl.

Manning has never won a big game in college, why should we think he will win a big game in the pros. The only thing that keeps Leaf from being a No. 1 selection is that he left his junior year, and Manning played five years in college but he still hasn't gotten it right. Once Leaf gets a season under his belt, he will be much more of a benefit to the Chargers, than a bruised and battered Peyton Manning will be to the Colts.

Remember this, Leaf just needs a little time and he will be a guaranteed superstar. Manning has many more questions surrounding him. The question of whether he can win the big game or not will be with him, until he either takes the Colts to a Super Bowl, or he returns to Tennessee for his sixth year and beats Florida just once.

what kind of a team the Minutemen are going to field in the fall.

The Offense

It looks as if the running backs will be the key to UMass' success in the 1998 season. Whether carrying the ball up the middle or recieving a pass off a screen, it will be up to the deepest part of the team to carry Whipple's new offensive scheme.

"Our strength is our running backs," Whipple said. "We want to use them more in the passing game. They've got the experience. They will be good players."

If all goes well and injuries stay away from the backfield, the Minutemen should have sophomore Marcel Shipp, senior Matt Jordan, senior Jim Pizano and junior Jamie Holston to utilize on all downs.

Look for senior tight end Kerry Taylor to get the most passes tossed his way. The senior coming off the line has the surest hands on the team and can take the ball up the middle of the field. One problem the new coaching staff is having is the lack of Doug Clark in spring practices. Due to his involvement with the UMass baseball team, he hasn't been able to work on the gridiron.

"We miss Clark, right now," Whipple said. "We're really young there."

Steve Ley is the only bright spot returning from last season's passing core that has been able to get out and practice.

The quarterback position is the question mark. Newly acquired junior, Todd Bankhead, who transferred from Palomar Junior College in California, seems to picking up Whipple's offensive scheme better than any of the other passers on the team. Junior returnee Jeff Smith brings experience and freshman back to the team. Though he plastooned the position with Anthony Catterton last season, due to inconsistent performances, Smith has another opportunity to prove to an offensive-minded coach that he can carry this team back in Atlantic 10 dominance.

The Defense

The core of the team is its linebackers. Led by senior Khari Samuel, it will be up to this group of players to help guide of very young and inexperienced defense against such offensive powerhouses as Villanova, Maine and Connecticut (UMass and UConn play each other twice this season because Boston University dropped its program).

Chris Price was moved from outside linebacker to defensive end in order to bring speed, strength and agility to a defensive line which sees the loss of graduates Mike Dawson and Jeron Alston.

This team has only practiced for little over a week and a half. The coaching staff has seen very little and is just getting used to a new program themselves. More will be known in the next couples of weeks as to how the team is progressing.

Right now, they're just concerned with next practice.

So until tomorrow, the Minutemen can sleep more soundly, pray for no injuries and dream about a great rebirth of excellence in the fall.

But soon, tomorrow will be Sept. 5, 1998 and Delaware will be ready.

Softball hosts improving Crimson squad

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team features one of the top pitchers in the country.

Today that talent will be put to the test, when UMass squares off at 3 p.m. at Totman Field with a Harvard team that has had its bats ablaze.

UMass junior pitcher Danielle Henderson now leads the nation in strikeouts-per-game, with 11.7 As a team, UMass is fifth in the country with an ERA of 0.96, led by Henderson, who is 11th at 0.76.

The Harvard Crimson (20–17, 4–0) are currently batting .291 as a team. For a team that has had problems with consistent hitting, they have been seeing some dramatic improvements lately. They are led by sophomore Deborah Abeles, who holds a batting average of .441, including seven homers and 36 RBI. Abeles, a native of Glendale, Calif., had a three-run homer in Monday's game against Boston University.

The hit, which came in the top of the eighth inning, was the game-winner for the Crimson. The 8–5 extra-inning win completed a doubleheader sweep of the Terriers, as the Crimson also won the first game by a score of 5–0.

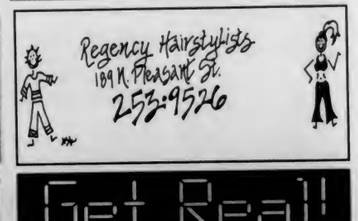
The homerun also broke a three-way tie for the school's single-season record for homers in a season (6). It was also the 10th of Abele's career, tying her with Katina Lee ('97) for the best record in school history. Abele also earned three RBI, giving her 73 for her career, and breaking the previous school record of 70.

For her spectacular play Abeles was named the Ivy League Pitcher of the Week this week. It is the second straight week she has earned that honor. In Harvard's last six games she had a batting average of .556 (15–of–27).

Junior Tara LaSovage also had a three-run homer in the match with Boston University. A utility player, LaSovage had her hit in the first game. It was her second homer of the season. In the seventh inning of the nightcap, freshman catcher Mairead McKendry also had her second homer of the season. LaSovage and McKendry are batting .326 and .333, respectively. Junior outfielder Karen Rice has a batting average of .375, and senior co-captain Jenny Franzese holds an average of .343.

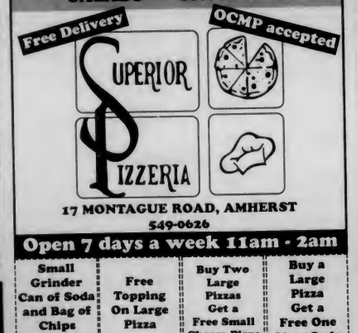
The Crimson are currently on a six–game winning streak, and tied for first place in their conference with Cornell. Leading pitcher Tasha Cupp holds a (10–3) record. The senior holds a 2.39 ERA, ranking her fifth in the Ivy League. She has struck out 84 batters in 94.1 innings of work. Freshman pitcher Chelsea Thoke leads the league in strikeouts, with 105 in 99.1 innings of work.

Cupp also garnered Ivy League honors this week, being named the Pitcher of the Week. In seven innings against Boston University she fanned a team season–high 12 batters. She did not allow a single run against the Terriers, and held them to three hits.



The last time UMass faced off with Harvard, the Minutewomen won the first game of the doubleheader, 2–1. The nightcap ended in a tie, as the game went to extra innings, and was finally called due to darkness.

Minutewomen Notes: UMass is coming off of a 4–0, 10–0 doubleheader sweep of Hartford Tuesday. Senior Tracey Osier was 5–8 in the series, scoring two runs, brining in two RBI's, and hitting a pair of doubles.



Junior Mandy Galas is currently riding a 15–game hitting streak, and has been hitting a team–best .491 (26–for–53) during that streak. She has also been posting a .717 slugging percentage. With four doubles and four triples, she has had more extra base hits in the past 15 games than in the first two years of her UMass career. She is now on pace to break the school's single season run record, and is fifth on the single–season triples chart with six.

Rubgy splits with Northeastern

The UMass rugby club was without 10 members of its first team last week when it traveled to Roxbury to take on Northeastern. Despite the missing members of the team — eight of whom were with the New England Collegiate All- Stars, and two of whom were with the Army Reserves — UMass XV held its own against Northeastern, which took the match, 10–3.

Penalties hurt both teams in the match, as a 60–yard UMass gain was negated by a penalty. Senior flankers Steve Bae and Dan Armbruster kept NU from scoring for the match's first 15 minutes.

After pushing down the field and facing yet another penalty, UMass was able to get on the board with a penalty kick by senior scrum Kevin Medeiros. That pushed the score to a 7–3 Northeastern lead.

UMass kept Northeastern pinned in its defensive zone for most of the remaining time, but the host team was able to connect on a penalty kick for a 10–3 lead.

Ryan Doherty had the best chance to score late for UMass, but he was pushed out of bounds inches from scoring.

The UMass second XV fared better, beating Northeastern, 12–0. Second row Steve Burrows and hooker Justin "Boris" White scored for UMass.

Lacrosse club falls to Dean

There is a reason Dean Junior College is the defending league champion. On April 11, it showed the UMass club lacrosse team why.

UMass' youth shone through and it had trouble with turnovers and Dean capitalized for a 15–7 win in Franklin.

UMass learned it still has work ahead of it, but did receive several positive performances on the day. Juan-Pablo Mas, Levence Eustay, Kevin Murray, Erik Beker and Chris Murray took advantage of groundball opportunities.

Gabe Martz and Gurmeet Singh each had multiple goals for UMass. Martz finished with three tallies and an assist, while Singh had two scores.

Dean coach Steve Schairer had high praise for UMass, especially the team's man–up unit.

For more information on the UMass club lacrosse team, contact coach Judy Dietel at 545–3815.

Mitchell, Irish lead track to win over five opponents

By Jana Benscoter
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's track and field team came out on top this past weekend in its first official track meet against Northeastern University, Boston College, Boston University, Brown, and Southern Connecticut.

The Minutewomen's final tally was 75 points, while NU took second place, finishing with 55.50 points. Brown grabbed the third place position with a total of 51.50 points.

The Minutewomen competed strong in every event and several of the women set personal records. By the end of the day, there were two school records broken. Shana Mitchell recieved a first place in the hammer throw, and her throw of 50.24m broke the current school record. Mitchell also performed well in the discus. She threw a total of 42.62m in the discuss to capture first place.

Silifa Kenku broke a school record in the 400m intermediate hurdles. She received the time of 1:01.91, which gave her first place in that event. Freshmen Chrystal Murphy and Erin Hankard took seventh and ninth place in the event as well.

"These two women are freshmen. In time they will develop. I am very pleased with their performances," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said.

In the 100m low hurdles, the UMass women swept the first three spots. Taking the first place position, with a time of 14.53, was Rosey Bryan. In second place was Anja Forrest with a time of 14.70, and following her was Murphy with a time of 14.73.

The Minutewomen who ran in the 4x400m relay — Michelle Cooper, Andrea Comeau, Kenku and Shelanda Irish — finished first with a time of 3:48.40. LaFreniere is very excited about their time because it is close to the school record that was set last season. This was only the second time this season that these women ran this event together.

In the 4x100m relay, UMass received second place with a time of 47.84.

"This was a better performance by the women in this event. There are still a few changes that need to be made in the hand–offs, but that will not take long to work out," LaFreniere said.

In other field events, Irish finished third in the long jump, while teammate Melanie Bell received fourth place. In the triple jump, Bryan took first place, jumping 11.65m. This was the first time that she had participated in the event outdoors.

In the shot put, Carole Laplante received a first place for the UMass squad with a throw of 12.22 m.

Along with teammate Mitchell, Alison Tostevin placed third in the discuss and Shannon Hamilton placed fifth. Sharyn Harrison received the first place in the javelin, throwing a distance of 38.54m.

Shelanda Irish also placed second in the 200m dash with a time of 25.76s. Raquell Shelton placed fourth for the squad in the 100m dash with a time of 12.62. Nicole Way placed second in the 800m run with a time of 2:16.62, which was a personal record. Way did not participate in the 1500m run this past weekend at Northeastern, which gave her a fresh start for the competition of the 800m run.

In distance, Rebecca Donaghue received a fifth place in the 1500m with a time of 4:38.83. This was respectable for Donaghue with the competition that she was facing; both Boston University and Brown had strong distant runners.

In the 3000m, Sally Hirsch placed fourth, Melissa Henderson placed fifth, and Tracy Meagher took sixth for Meagher, her 10:25.83 was a personal record.

This weekend the Minutewomen will be facing tough competition again at the University of Connecticut. They will be facing Brown University, Syracuse University, the University of Rhode Island and Providence College.

Men's track moves to road after taking final home win

By Jana Benscoter
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's track and field team ended its two–meet homestand with a win. This win put the men's squad at a record of 4–0. At the meet was Providence College, Holy Cross, and Iona. UMass finished with a score of 123 points, leaving Providence with a score of 11, Holy Cross with a score of 39 and Iona with a score of 24.

There were three school records set this past weekend for the men. Jesse Austin received a second place in the javelin with the sixth best throw in school history. In the 200m dash, Scott Price received a first place with a time of 22.1, which places him with the ninth best performance in school history.

Also setting a record for the men's squad was Albie Vasquez, who received a first place in the pole vault event.

The men's squad received several first places. The Minutemen received a first place in the 4x100 relay, long jump (Kyle Kinmer), 110 high hurdles (Ben Baraldi), shot put (Ian Stevens), the 400m (Tom Toye), the javelin (Vic Morency), the 100m dash (Dave Greco).

UMass also took the top spots in the triple jump (Brandon Tutt), the 400m intermediate hurdles (Neil Concepcion), the discuss (Vic Morency), the hammer throw (B.J. Cardoza) and the 4x400 relay. Along with a first in the long jump, Kinmer received a second place in the pole vault.

The Minutemen dominated this past weekend against their competitors. Thirteen registered qualifying performances for the New England Championships.

This weekend, the UMass squad will be heading to Northeastern, where it will be competing against the Huskies, Dartmouth College and the University of Rhode Island.

another goal, followed by freshman Jeremy Guski's sixth tally on the year.

With just under five minutes remaining in the third quarter, it was a whole new ball game as senior co–captain Mike DelPercio cannoned a shot past Cynar from the top side. Momentum had swung over the Minutemen's side, as six unanswered goals in 19 minutes knotted the affair up at nine goals apiece.

With the score tied at 10 with only a quarter to play, the prime time players stepped up, with Bevilacqua and Negus combining for the quarter's only five goals. Negus ended the night with a career–high four scores, two–upped by Bevilacqua's own career–high of six tallies.

"We were out–groundballed 28–21 in the game," Cannella said. "That was the biggest part of the game. We can't be thinking about the NCAA tournament. The way I look at it, every game from now is a must win."

The Minutemen next travel to South Bend, Ind. to jostle with the Notre Dame Fighting Irish on Sunday.

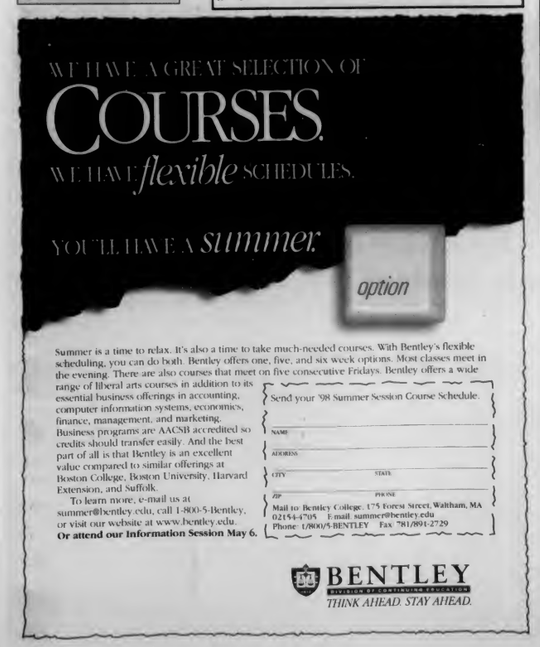
scoring streak while freshman Jen Nardi continued to play well in net. Nardi relieved fellow freshman Tara Durkin after Durkin made five saves.

With 6:12 left to play in the game, the scoreboard showed the score tied at 7–7 when Pavlick refused to let the Minutewoman flame go out by providing her own spark in the form of the tie–breaking goal. With UMass up 8–7, the Flying Dutchwomen desperately battled back as Heather Kain found a seam in the Minutewomen defense and once again deadlocked the score.

As the time ticked off the clock, UMass appeared headed into yet another overtime period this year. The Minutewomen have already played three this season, two against Harvard and one against Brown. Both games ended with UMass coming away with the win.

The Minutewomen have proved themselves to be able to pull ahead when necessary in the close games and yesterday would be no exception. Pavlick made sure of that as she flew into the Hofstra defense and gave UMass early leave from Hempstead, N.Y.



The Minutewomen will return to action this weekend when they host Syracuse at 1 p.m. Sunday.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Though you may be prepared to go without today, you should be able to enjoy an abundance of whatever it is you want the most.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Your sense of purpose may be blunted temporarily today by a distraction that you certainly can do without. Be sure to focus on what counts the most.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You can afford to show a little more sympathy toward a friend's difficulties. Sure, you're trying to be objective, but enough is enough.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may want to wait a little while longer before handling down a decision that many will consider permanent. What others think is an issue.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may be in a position to call the shots today, but if you are wise you will accept input from those who are in the trenches.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Questions about your future begin to today without disturbing others? It is essential that you are fully self-contained at this time.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — A good friend or loved one is likely to recount an experience today that has you envious. This can serve as a potent motivator for you.

Ryan Leaf will be better in pro ranks

On April 18, approximately 12 p.m. the Indianapolis Colts will have a decision to make. They will have to decide on whether to choose Ryan Leaf of Washington State University or Peyton Manning from the University of Tennessee.

These two college quarterbacks are slotted to go one-two in this year's draft. The question is who will be the better NFL quarterback? Meaning, which of these athletes will put up better numbers during the course of his career and what specific type of impact will each player have on the teams which they are expected to go to?

The answer is obvious in more ways then one. Let's break it down one by several factors that go into making a great quarterback. Although the numbers lean towards Manning, Leaf still had a better quarterback rating, with a rating of 107.4. He also threw 33 touchdowns and one fewer interception than Manning.

Leaf also has stronger qualities in various areas. He is a stronger passer, his passes have more zip on them and carry more velocity. He throws a better deep ball. He also carries a nice touch on his short pass.

Leaf is just an all-around tougher player. He is bigger; Leaf is 6-foot-5, 241 pounds, while Manning is 6-foot-5, 229. Experts say that Leaf is less likely to get injured, similar to quarterbacks like Drew Bledsoe and Vinny Testaverde who have not suffered too many injuries despite being hit throughout their careers.

"Our team has played against both quarterbacks, and Leaf is an unflappable oak tree in the pocket," said UCLA coach Bob Toledo in Sports Illustrated.

Leaf really distinguishes himself from Manning right here. Leaf will stay in the pocket and is more calm, cool, and collected, yet Manning in big

QB Manning will be magic in the NFL

It's that time of the year again, and of course the big question in this weekend's draft concerns two No. 16's: Peyton Manning and Ryan Leaf. Expected to go one-two in the draft, the brunt of the speculation has been focused on who will be the one to pan out in the long run.

Will both quarterbacks have their future franchises molded around them, the dream for many aspiring gunslingers? What about comments of future greatness? Championships?

Of course with all these questions comes an inordinate amount of pressure. Other players have supposedly been predestined for greatness, unfortunately mostly due to media hype and misguided notions of adaptability to the NFL. See Todd Marinovich, who was taken before three-time MVP Brett Favre in 1991.

Jamie Jee

Marinovich is just one example of several first-round flops, but Manning appears to be the real deal. Who is one of the most intelligent quarterbacks to ever play the college game? Manning. Who throws the ball with striking accuracy, allowing for yards upon yards after the catch? Manning. Who has handled the scrutiny of being in a Heisman race with class and perseverance? Manning. Are you getting the picture?

That picture should be crystal clear for new head coach Jim Mora and general manager Bill Polian in Indianapolis. Manning has the type of perseverance and maturity necessary to turn around a franchise like the Colts. Owner Jim Moray should have no qualms in the investment that comes with riding on the strong right arm of Manning.

Both quarterbacks have the ability to make the big plays but Manning has the better touch and has continuously refined it to near perfection. The work Manning has done on his timing will prove invaluable in the NFL, where blitzes

Lacrosse drops heartbreaker to Harvard

Bevilacqua's six tallies boost Crimson to victory

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

With 12 seconds remaining in the final quarter in the showdown between No. 10 Massachusetts men's lacrosse and No. 19 Harvard last night, it came down to Manhasset, N.Y.'s finest lacrosse.

Minuteman Goalie John Kasselakis and the Crimson's Jim Bevilacqua would meet at point blank range. They had played years of high school together, forming a offense- defense punch that led the Long Island squad to a 47-4 record in their final three years.

From the end line, closely guarded by senior Jamie Doherty, Bevilacqua cut towards the crease left of the goal, gaining a step on the defenseman. Running into a crowd of defensemen, Bevilacqua jumped up in the air and pucketed the ball past Kasselakis to give the Crimson the 13-12 victory and the mythical Bay State crown. The goal came four minutes after Bevilacqua's equalizer.

Harvard	13
Massachusetts	12

"We have a system, especially for pressure situations, and that system broke down," Kasselakis said.

The Minutemen (6-3) hoped to bounce back from a two- game losing streak against rivals Loyola and Duke. Instead, the Minutemen dropped their third straight for the first time since 1985.

UMass worked hard to even get to that point, falling down early in the game, much like last weekend's contest with Loyola, in which the Minutemen stumbled to a 5-1 deficit.

Opening up the game under the lights for the first time at Richard F. Garber Field, Harvard (7-3, 3-1 Ivy League) nearly blew UMass out of the stadium. Sophomore Mike Janowicz fired one past goalie Keith Cynar in the opening minute to give UMass the lead.

The Crimson struck back fiercely, answering the goal with six of their own to open up a 6-1 advantage. Bevilacqua and his brother Lou scored three goals in the span.

As the crowd quieted, a senior stepped up. All-American Harold Drumm tried to spark the UMass offense, picking up a groundball and going the length of the field to net his first goal of the season.

Harvard ended with the first quarter with a lared Chupaila shot past Kasselakis's right leg to complete the onslaught, making the score 7-2.

"We didn't play well at all in the first quarter," Drumm said. "We let everyone down, I let myself down. You have to give them credit, but there's no excuse for what happened out there."

The second quarter looked much like the first at the start. Chupalla found the back of the net again. The lead grew to 9-3 after goals by UMass's Jay Negus and then Bevilacqua's third on the night.

The resiliency of the UMass squad was revealed at that point. The offense finally woke up, bombarding Cynar with shots, three that were successful, to make the halftime score 9-6. Freshman John Madigan received a feed from Chris Martens from behind the goal to score the Minutemen's fourth. Soon after, Negus registered

Football begins practice

The Massachusetts football team is back in the swing of things now that new coach Mark Whipple has started spring practices.

Whipple focusing on present, rather than future

Tomorrow.

That's all that's concerning the new head coach of the Massachusetts football team, right now. What's going to happen tomorrow?

Mark Whipple, the transfer coach from Brown who replaced Mike Hodges after UMass' lackluster 2-9 season, is not worried about a week from now. He's certainly not concerned about who will lead the team in tackles next season. He doesn't care who catches the most touchdowns.

All that he's concerning himself with, now, is how the team is practicing this spring — in order to prepare for the first game of the season against Delaware on Sept. 5.

"We've go so much to make up, with the new system," Whipple said. "Right now we just want to get the guys to practice, correct mistakes and make sure the fundamentals are down."

With just over a week under their belts, practicing is all that the Minutemen have seen. In the first eight days since Whipple has come to the Amherst campus, UMass practiced on six of them, and it hasn't slowed down.

"We've had a lot of practice in one week," Whipple said. "After one week, we've seen a lot of improvement. We'll probably move it down to three practices a week so the guys can watch more film."

The team has been working hard to prepare for its annual Spring game, which is on Saturday, May 2 at 10:30 a.m. at McGuirk Stadium. It's a great opportunity for the campus and local community to get an idea as to

Women's lax picks up win with late goal from Pavlick

By Jamie Jee

One of the most important aspects of a team, one that separates it from being simply average, is a decision it must make. A decision to refuse to be passive, and accept the responsibility of taking the initiative necessary to win games.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team took that initiative yesterday, defeating Hofstra, 9-8.

UMass (6-3) locked up the victory with only 35 seconds remaining in regulation when sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick blazed her shot by Flying Dutchwomen goalie Jackie Carroll to avoid extending play into overtime. Pavlick capped off a career game with four goals on the day in serving as the bookend scorer in the win.

Pavlick opened the game with a quick goal which was then returned by three straight from Hofstra to put the Minutewomen in a early hole. UMass showed its resilience by countering with two scores of their own, with Pavlick refusing to be silenced and junior attack Laura Kortz continuing to add to her goal total.

The teams remained even at 3-3 and battled defensively throughout the first half, with UMass denying several scoring attempts by the breaking Flying Dutchwomen attack. Hofstra would eventually sneak in a goal before the half, however, giving it the lead 4-3.

As the teams rejoined for the second half of the game, neither team would let the other put together any kind of

North, South Korea remain at impasse

BEIJING (AP) — The first direct talks in four years between the rival Koreas ended yesterday without any progress following disagreements over the North's insistence on receiving aid before discussing the South's demand to reunite divided families. Negotiators from North and South Korea met for nearly two hours in a Beijing hotel, but "there was no result," said Kim Ok Joon, a South Korean Embassy official.

"There are many gaps in opinion," the South's lead negotiator, Deputy Unification Minister Jeong Se-hyun, was quoted as telling South Korea's Yonhap news agency.

No future meetings were scheduled, but the two sides will stay in contact, Kim said. The two delegations were also to meet for dinner tonight, he said. He said he didn't know when the delegations would return home.

The two sides did not meet Wednesday, partly because of a national holiday in North Korea marking the birthday of former leader Kim Il Sung, the embassy official said.

The discussions, which started Saturday in Beijing, are the first direct talks between the two sides since Kim's death in 1994.

Hackers breach Pentagon computers

WASHINGTON (AP) — Hiding behind anonymous keyboard clicks, a group of hackers struggled for two weeks to breach U.S. military and civilian computer networks. They succeeded beyond their wildest dreams, the Pentagon said yesterday.

The culprits: a special U.S. national security team that was secretly testing the vulnerability of the nation's computer system using software found on the Internet.

Code-named "Eligible Receiver," the cyberwar game proved what the Defense Department said it has long known — that its computers are susceptible targets, which became clear earlier this year when real hackers made a "systematic attack."

"It found that we have a lot of work to do to provide better security," Pentagon spokesman Ken Bacon said of the cyberwar game last June, which went after unclassified computer systems. "We're not alone in this regard."

The Pentagon plans to spend nearly $1 billion a year for the next several years to improve its classified and unclassified computer security, Bacon said, noting the department has 2.1 million computers. Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre is shepherding a stepped-up anti-hacker program that includes a counter-intelligence effort to stop intruders before they get through the electronic door, the Pentagon said.

Town Meeting to discuss poster–free zones

JOHN BURT / COLLEGIAN

The side of a bus stop is covered with staples and tape from old posters.

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Town Meeting will vote next month on whether or not to allow poster kiosks and subsequent poster free zones to be created in downtown Amherst.

Amherst resident John Furbish has introduced a warrant article to Town Meeting, which asks Town Meeting members to declare Amherst a "poster–friendly community." If passed, it would call to a halt the efforts of the Amherst Town Commercial Relations Committee (TCRC) to restrict postering in certain areas.

The TCRC is in the process of creating kiosks in the downtown area, these kiosks will have surfaces where posters and flyers would be placed. The areas around these kiosks, where posters had previously been placed, would then become "poster–free zones." The kiosks are intended to hold all the posters which would have been put up throughout these poster–free zones.

Former UMass professor Howard Ziff is among those who feel the poster–free zones restrict free speech, and said that the public sentiment against posters is misplaced.

Citing Protestant reformer Martin Luther's posting of his theses on the church door in Wittenberg, Germany as one of the earliest examples of postering's legacy of free speech, he also mentioned the benefits of postering in modern times.

"[Posters are] the poor mans press, the community's cultural calendar," Ziff said. "They are the son's way of finding a lost cat, and an adult's way of recovering a lost cause."

Wayfinding signs

The kiosks were originally designed as a series of Wayfinding signs to aid town businesses. These wayfinding signs eventually had postering functions added to them. The first kiosk had these two elements separated, and the wayfinding signs are on the corner of the Subway building.

A 1993 TCRC report cites reducing visual clutter and keeping the downtown clean and attractive as a couple of the reasons for the town to control postering. It also referred to posters as a "significant source of downtown litter," and said posters were a potential driving hazard because they could distract drivers and obscure traffic signs and signals.

The TCRC report refers to posters as a community resource for information, but that uncontrolled postering leaves the downtown looking unkempt and dirty. As a result, it said, visitors to Amherst get a bad impression and could take their business elsewhere.

Kiosk trouble

As of now, only one kiosk has been constructed, on the corner of Main Street and North Pleasant Street, by Subway. Its accompanying poster free zone stretches from the left- hand side of Russell's Package Store to the left-hand side of the former site of Rasa Sayang.

During the March 31 Select Board meeting, Bryan Harvey said that while the poster free zone was in effect, there were no plans to enforce it.

Yet a 1993 memorandum from town Senior Planner John Tucker to the TCRC shows that under the law, postering is a privilege, not a right. In the memorandum, Tucker said, according to Supreme Court decision, government can "regulate speech in terms of its time, place and manner, but not its terms of content."

This kiosk, which is merely a utility box that has been sided with plywood panels, does not fit the specifications the TCRC had laid out for all kiosks.

According to Tucker, the reason for this is that improvements are planned for the Main Street/North Pleasant Street intersection, which would have entailed the dismantling of any established kiosk.

Poets speak for posters

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts Poetry Society have worked in cooperation with the Amherst based Coalition for Postering Rights and Responsibilities to oppose Amherst's postering regulations.

Tini Ostrander, president of the UMass Poetry Society, and another member have written poems on the "postering ban." They have videotaped readings of their poems, and will soon appear on WMUA and WAMH to read them, in support of John Furbish's Town Meeting warrant article to make Amherst a poster-friendly town (see related story).

"If posters are taken down, it prevents people from seeing programs we put on for the UMass community," Ostrander said. "It's a form of sterilization."

The following is an excerpt from Ostrander's poem "The Pages of Kiosks is Dearth," which he wrote in opposition to the postering ban.

We the five people of the Amherst Select Board speak these words.
Saying, We are the pedants who brought you out of sanity.
Out from the bondage of multiplicity. Heed us heartfully, ye obsequious ones!
For the town is a temple and those who worship its magis-

Minutemaniac set to race

Concrete canoe launched on Wednesday

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

They said the Titanic could never sink, and some said the "Minutemaniac" would never float.

The Minutemaniac, a canoe made of concrete, built by University of Massachusetts civil engineering students was launched on Wednesday in the Campus Pond.

Today, the engineering students will race against the concrete canoes built by other schools.

Students lifted the 17-foot-6-inch and 150 pound canoe into the pond, then team leaders Rob Ryan and Wendy Parmenter, both junior civil engineering majors, paddled the canoe around the pond.

After the students safely navigated their way around the island, under the bridge and across the pond, they proceeded with a swamp test.

A swamp test is an experiment to make sure the boat will float, even when submerged. The students filled the canoe with water and it still floated, passing the swamp test. The tips of the canoe were filled with foam, and lifted the canoe out above the water.

"I was kind of nerve wrecked before," Ryan said. "I was afraid something was going to go wrong, and nothing did."

Ryan said students put 600 to 700 hours into the design and construction of the canoe.

"We had a mold we used last year," Ryan said. "We modified the mold to make it faster."

Today the team of 10 students is at the University of Vermont in Burlington to race their canoe against the canoes built by civil engineering students from 17 other schools in the Northeast.

In total, the UMass students will compete in five races. There races, which are 200 and 700 meters each consist of two male races, two female races and one co-ed race.

Other teams include the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, University of Vermont, University of New Hampshire, the University of Connecticut and others.

Teams must also present a ten–page paper to judges as well as a five–minute–maximum presentation. The winning team will go to the national competition held annually. The event is sponsored by the American Society of Civil Engineers.

The canoe is held afloat by a principal known as Archimedes law, which deals with surface area, and buoyant forces. Ryan said it would probably take 2,000 to 3,000 pounds to sink the canoe.

"This is our launch, we just have to win a few races now," Noel Moore, a junior on the team, said.

Some members of the team were worried about the canoe sinking because it rides very low on the water.

"It's going to be tougher since it's relatively shallow," said Dara Colleary, a senior team member. "But I'm very optimistic."

There are also concerns the canoe will break, but Ryan said the wire reinforcement is strong enough to hold it together.

The team has been practicing in a regular canoe at Puffers Pond.

The maiden voyage of the Minutemaniac came just one day after the anniversary of the sinking of the Titanic, but thus far has had better results.

Harvard Crimson said to deny position to Jew

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

Recently a staff member of the Harvard Crimson was denied the position of editorial chair, and the parties involved are disputing if it was because he lacked the appropriate skills or because of his religion.

The process for deciding next year's executive board, a body of roughly 20 students which run the paper, began last November. At that time eight out of 10 regular columnists were Jewish.

Justin Danilewitz, a government and Middle Eastern affairs major, says he was denied the position because the executives feared over-representation of Jewish viewpoints.

Danilewitz said the two editors who were hired in his place were given the position because they advocated reducing the number of Jewish columnists.

"This was not a personal issue. [Not being hired] had nothing to do with my work as a writer," Danilewitz, a frequent guest columnist for the Crimson, said.

Danilewitz voiced his grievances in a recent article for commentary magazine entitled. "Counting Noses at the Harvard Crimson."

Crimson President Matthew Granade said, "Danilewitz was passed over for editorial chair of the Harvard Crimson because he lacked the skills and commitment to take on the position; not because he is Jewish."

"If the Crimson does use quotas — and we don't — then we are very bad mathematicians," Granade said.

Tornados touch down in Tenn. & Ark., four dead

By Peggy Harris
Associated Press

MANILA, Ark. — A tornado cloaked by darkness and sheets of rain tore through Tennessee and Arkansas early yesterday, splintering mobile homes and killing four people, including a little brother and sister.

"People heard it but couldn't see it," Manila firefighter Michael White said. "It passed probably 400 yards from my house. There was so much lightning and rain I didn't see anything."

Yesterday afternoon another tornado struck downtown Nashville, Tenn., blowing out windows in dozens of downtown buildings, ripping off roofs and knocking over trees. Jean Ridley, spokeswoman for the Metro Fire Department, reported injuries from flying glass, but had no details.

The earlier storm hit Manila, in northeastern Arkansas, about 3 a.m., killing Casey Lomax, 3, and Brittany Lomax, 5. Their parents were injured.

An hour later, a tornado spawned by the same storm killed Paul and Peggy Kolwyck in Roellen, Tenn., about 50 miles east of Manila. Their bodies were found 200 to 250 feet from their trailer home, which was torn apart.

"Part of it went to the east and part went to the west," Dyer County Executive James McCord said.

The twisters were part of a series of storms that hit Arkansas, Illinois and Tennessee late Wednesday and yesterday. More than two dozen people were injured, and 65 railroad cars were knocked off the track near Flora, Ill.

At the Lomax family's trailer home, the twister left little more than rows of cinder blocks that had supported the home, splintered wood and a child's scooter on a pile of rubble. The children were thrown from the trailer and were found near each other.

Manila is a half-hour east of Jonesboro, where four students and a teacher were killed in a schoolyard ambush last month.

"If there was any area of our state that did not need to experience this, it would be northeast Arkansas," Gov. Mike Huckabee said.

this first kiosk. He considers it a lack of effort on the town's part to create a suitable display area for posters and flyers.

"There's nothing which draws people to it," Furbish said.

Ziff also was not pleased with the initial kiosk.

"A kiosk ought to be attractive in its own right," Ziff said. "But after much huffing and puffing, we've given birth to plywood panels."

According to Tucker, future kiosks will be four-sided and bigger, and will also include wayfinding signs for uptown businesses to aid shoppers and tourists.

A nuisance?

Ziff said posters are a visible representation of the spirit of Amherst, which lets out-of-towners know "they're not in Kansas anymore."

Many others, however, look upon the overabundance of posters in the uptown area as a nuisance.

Select Board member Bryan Harvey said he was in favor of establishing kiosks and subsequent poster-free zones in order to avoid a "poster spree" in the downtown area.

Harvey said opponents of the postering regulations were misinterpreting it as a ban, which he feels it is not.

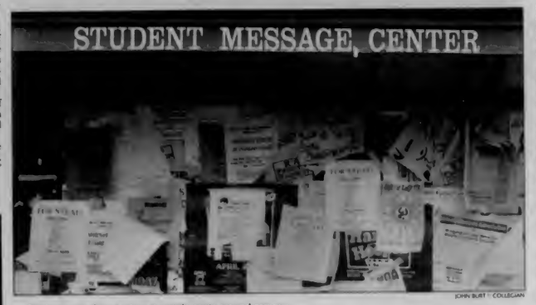
"You can't suppress posters, but a community like ours ought to have the right not to have posters everywhere," Harvey said.

Furbish, however, maintains that this is a ban, and said the forming of the initial kiosk and poster free zone has resulted in a loss of 65 feet of postering space. This comes despite the 1993 TCRC report, which said the kiosks would have an "equal surface area to current significant postering space in the public way."

He said he finds Tucker, the Select Board and the TCRC to be "poster-unfriendly."

"They say the kiosks are an improvement," Furbish said. "But the implementation of it seems destructive."

Furbish agreed that postering in Amherst was a mess, but said more involvement and cooperation from poster producers, distributors and consumers could solve many of the towns postering problems. He cited Kevin's Auto Repair as being problematic posterers.



"Kevin's Auto Repair sends out mindless automatons to put up as many posters as they can," Furbish said. "On some telephone poles, they will have six posters all together; they just don't give a darn."

Town Senior Planner John Tucker said that posters are not only a problem for the mess they cause, but most are also placed illegally on privately owned buildings and property.

"Most of the things posted downtown are privately owned by the PVTA, the electric and the phone utilities," Tucker said. "Most of them don't want posters on their structures, and it also poses them with a maintenance problem."

Furbish, who is a member of the Coalition for Postering Rights and Responsibilities, said it is not the town's place to decide where posters can and can't be placed.

"It seems obnoxious for the town to step in between these so-called private entities and the public," Furbish said. "The utilities, the Valley Advocate and the bus systems are all sort of public anyway."

Granade said that the lack of the diversity in the newsroom has historically been a problem for the paper, and that the paper is concerned with seeing the voices of the student body represented on the page. The staff of about 300, one-fourth of which work in the newsroom, is completely voluntary, so the paper is looking to expand the staff.

Granade said the number of columnists has extended to 16; nine of whom are lewish. He also said that the co-chairs who were hired are both lewish.

"Expanding the number of columnists has helped us get more women and minorities on the page... we also extended the size of the page from one full page to a page and a half," he said.

Danilewitz said he has ceased his work as a columnist for the paper because it is not an environment in which he feels comfortable. He said a fellow columnist, Eric Nelson, was asked to give up his column because he is lewish.

Nelson could not be reached for comment.

The paper is a daily publication with weekly and monthly supplements. The position of editorial chair is responsible for the columns, policy editorials and solicited manuscripts the paper prints.

Clinton fights to reduce interest on student loans

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Staff

The Clinton Administration has won an important victory for students who finance their college educations with federal loans. Despite a well-financed lobbying effort by the banking industry and other private lenders, the House Education and the Workforce Committee has agreed with the administration's position that student loan interest rates should be reduced.

With this new initiative, student borrowers will experience significant savings in their interest rates when paying back these loans.

Student loan interest rates now average at about 7.8 percent. As of July, a new formula is scheduled to go into effect that would lower rates to an average of 7 percent. Students will save significantly with this new program.

For example, an undergraduate who borrows $12,000 would save $650 in interest over a standard 10-year repayment period. Graduate students who borrow $60,000 will save $3,200.

Faced with a profit reduction under the new formula, lenders have pressed Congress to repeal the change and have threatened to abandon the loan program if it goes into effect. The Clinton Administration is committed to ensuring students the full benefit of the scheduled interest rate reduction. In order to appease the lenders, the administration proposed a legislative solution on Feb. 25, which will both safeguard the savings for students while providing a more competitive yield to lenders.

A recent U.S. Treasury analysis confirmed that the President's proposal would, in fact, provide lenders with a sufficient return.

To further appease lenders, the House Committee has agreed that, while implementing an interest rate reduction for students, it must also create new subsidies for lenders at a substantial taxpayer expense. This is estimated at $2.7 billion over five years.

David Frank, Director of Communications at the United States Department of Education said in a press release, "As the loan interest issue comes before the U.S. Senate for consideration, the administration will continue to fight for students."

"At the same time, we continue to believe that students can be protected without taxpayers further subsidizing the record profits of lenders," he said.

In asking one student at the University of Massachusetts how she felt about the new formula, including taxpayers having to subsidize the lenders, sociology graduate student Heather-Lyn Haley said, "It's hard for me to understand why they [the lenders] would need subsidies, but if it's really necessary then the tax is a good place for the money to come out."

"There are so many other things that are payed for through taxes that could be cut that have less impact on the future of the country. To me, education is more important than a lot of the defense budget things and corporate funding. That's what taxes are for," she said.

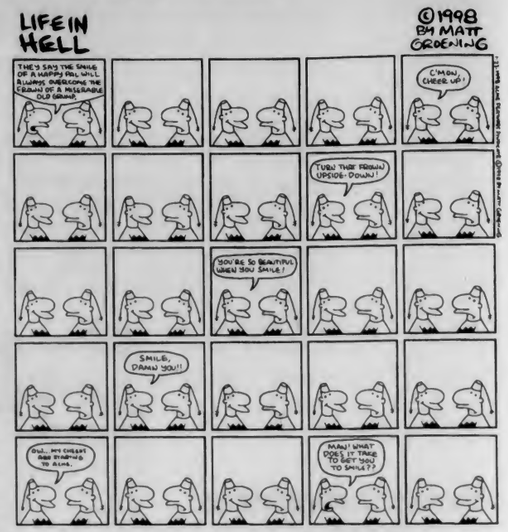
CSL & Honors College

The Honors Program is always eager to find new ways to challenge its students in every way possible, and as the Honors College is given its finishing touches, a desire to keep these students challenged has been one of the reasons for implementing a community service program called Community Service Learning (CSL).

CSL is a program in which students develop a better understanding of the theories and practices taught in the classroom through active participation in service in the community. It gives the students an opportunity to use the skills they acquire in the classroom in real-life situations. It is a great idea in which students can put theory into practice, and is a program which has been available to the whole UMass community, although few are aware of it.

In fact there have been a number of non-honors classes which have successfully adopted CSL as a fourth credit option. Last year, Professor Art Keene's course "Anthropology and the Public Interest" organized a community service program for an after-school program at a local school. Assistant Professor Dee Royster's "Race Relations" course tackled numerous community projects dealing with issues from housing discrimination to helping with an after-class writing and acting club for middle school students. Both classes were a great success for all involved and provide good examples of how students could extend their learning into the community.

Suddenly, however, this concept of Community Service Learning has become the brainchild of the Honors College. But is this introduction of CSL into the Honors College curriculum a response to charges of elitism and racism in its admissions process? Is it a plan to hush those voices of opposition? With all this community experience, especially experience within diverse communities many of these honors students would never come in contact with, the Honors College can now proudly boast, that yes, it may be an elite institution, but at least it has a student body of "good" elites. Of course, some of these students could be struck with some level of consciousness, and may join the fight to end the structures of privilege that got them where they are. The overall significance of this effect on the students, though, is being overshadowed by lures of academic benefits.



Vivian Berghahn & Alicia Laury

Is this CSL idea one truly based on genuine interest in the community at large and not just a promotional push for the Honors College? After all, it is the members of the community where these missionary acts take place who will be the most affected. A couple of workshops on cultural sensitivity and community service are not enough to erase a lifetime of stereotypical misconceptions most of white America is fed about those less privileged. Such misconceptions will undoubtedly cloud the minds of many CSL students as they set off on their CSL missions. For many of these students, they will be confronted with issues of class and/or race that only previously existed in textbooks.

Service itself is an admirable act and useful learning tool. The problem is when the power structures affects community service. Helping those in need is a praise worthy ambition; however, when one thinks of CSL, what is the general idea that comes to mind? What is its purpose? Do we do it because we want to help others who are disadvantaged, or do we do it for personal benefits such as extra credits and resume builders? Community service shouldn't be viewed as just an academic challenge, because in the community the experiences are social and political challenges, reactions to which will affect whoever the students are trying to help.

Whatever the motivation is that lures us into a Community Service Learning environment, it is imperative that we understand the power dynamics that give us the privilege of being the helpers instead of the helped, while at the same time viewing those we are helping as equals, not as other. CSL project leaders need to keep these concerns in mind when implementing CSL into their courses, as the interaction between students and the community is complex and easily manipulated. Administrators should not blindly use CSL as a means of promoting the Honors College.

Vivian Berghahn and Alicia Laury are UMass students. Steve Gold, also a UMass student, contributed to this column.

Spring at UMass

Happy spring, UMass! There is not going to be a spring concert. The Student Government Association (SGA) has gone comatose. Apartments are burning down. Alcohol has suddenly become a problem both on campus and in Amherst. Women's hockey is still a club sport, despite taking fourth at the Nationals recently. What the heck is going on here?

We all already know the stories, myths and legends regarding the spring concert. In the end, it all boils down to this simple fact: we aren't getting one.

When I talk about this with my friends from other schools, I get pretty mad and disappointed. Most of them go to schools which are much smaller than UMass. They are getting spring concerts. Rumor has it that the shows that are venturing to their schools boast some good acts. Some of those bands were supposedly going to play here.

Adam Bossi

How could schools whose student population is as small as one tenth of UMass' afford a concert if we can not? I assumed that by paying the activity fee in our tuition, the show would go on. My question is, since we are not getting what we paid for, when do we get our money back? The way I see it, the University has a lot of check writing to do.

Dumb thing number two: the SGA. Here is a prime example of democracy at its zenith... of absolute amentia. Before I voted in the last elections, I read up a bit on what the candidates were all about. Seemed to me that they all wanted the same basic things. ATMs all over campus. Unlocked dorms during the day. Gourmet meals in the DCs. And whatever else they thought us voters might like.

Those elections came and went weeks ago. Now, well after the ballots were tabulated, there is still whining and carrying on amount the elected and other former candidates. "He ripped down my campaign sign! She got illegal campaign funds! They made fun of my mama!" Give me a break, don't hold more elections. All the candidates wanted the same things for the campus. Shove one of them into office and give us our unlocked dorms and ATMs.

"Save Our Beer!" A catch phrase that was popular last semester. With all the stuff going on at UMass, why has alcohol suddenly become a gigantic problem? Aren't there more important things to worry about other than kids drinking beer? This may be a sick rumor, but haven't college kids been drinking for eons? It seems to me that this is just something that occurs (almost) naturally. The sun rises in the east, and UMass students drink. Want to curb student drinking? Give us something else that would spark our interests... like a spring concert.

Here is something else that struck me as, for a lack of better words, messed up. The women's hockey team recently came in fourth in the Nationals at Lake Placid. They had an incredible season. I had the pleasure of attending a couple games. It's safe to say they are good. They play with finesse and vigor. Despite proving themselves as true competitors, UMass women's hockey is still a club sport. Basically, that means they work their butts off, on and off the ice, to keep their team together. They carpool to their games in their own cars. They did fund-raisers. They were on the ice early several times a week for practice. Lastly, they had a great record for the season! My question: why is this still a club sport? These ladies worked as hard, if not harder than, any other sports team on campus. They boasted a record worth bragging about. In fact they did better than some of the varsity teams did this season. Yet, this continues to be a club sport. Something is wrong with that picture.

The wonderful world of UMass seems to be in a state of confusion. What the heck is going on? Perhaps it is because all us students have been drinking so much and don't know what is going on. I mean, drinking is the huge problem all of a sudden. I bet the food in the DCs really is not that bad, but we can't tell. All we taste is beer. There are ATMs all over campus, its just that we don't notice them, cause we're too busy drinking. Maybe the SGA candidates are wrecked too. Yeah, that's it. They're too stewed to know who the new president is. They used the money that was set aside for the spring concert to throw a huge, we want to be politicians kegger. The women's hockey team is kept at club level because they are mostly lightweights and can't drink as much as, say, the starting line up for the men's varsity football team.

What a world UMass is. Rather, what a strange rationale the overseers of the school have. Buildings are in dire need of repair, potholes are swallowing up cars, sick raccoons are running rampant across campus, etc., etc. Allocating money to renovate places such as Bartlett's room 65 seems much more sensible than throwing it away in a vain attempt to curb student drinking. The physical structure of the campus to me seems in more need of help than most of the students.

To sum it up, we have bought into a school that currently has a defunct student government and some really raunchy classrooms. Once we got here, we all immediately became "the drunk kids who go to ZooMass." I'm not sure what is going on with things here. It is all kind of freaking me out.

Adam Bossi is a UMass student.

Radiohead & Spiritualized bring adventure to Centrum

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

RADIOHEAD / SPIRITUALIZED
Worcester Centrum Centre
April 15

WORCESTER — Wednesday night's Radiohead concert marked their first-ever headlining "arena" concert in America. After steadily building a solid fan base over the last five years, they've finally broken through with the masterful OK Computer — an ambitious 12-song cycle that addresses a dizzying variety of macabre subjects including car crashes, aliens, politics and urban claustrophobia.

The question was, how would the psychedelic orchestrations and serpentine arrangements of such an intricate and diverse work come off in the cavernous confines of a sports arena?

Radiohead pulled the trick off quite nicely, thank you very much. Thanks to a brilliant lighting scheme and a sense of both purpose and adventure in their 21-song set (including three new songs), the English quartet found a perfect match of the arty and infectious.

What sets Radiohead head and shoulders above their peers is their ability to have a willingness to experiment with their songs in a live setting while not meandering into self-masturbatory guitar heroics and the like.

"My Iron Lung" and "Exit Music (For A Film)" were both perfect illustrations of this. Lead guitarist Jonny Greenwood toiled with his bevy of guitar effects to create an angular riffing style that juxtaposed the simple chord structures being played by Ed O'Brien and Thom Yorke. With such an array of guitar trickery and layers, it would have been easy for drummer Phil Selway to overcompensate by bludgeoning his kit and going for sonic overkill — a common occurrence in many arena shows. Such was simply not the case, however.

Instead, the band played as a tight unit, both intrepid and intuitive at once. While their virtuostic musical abilities were quite evident, their intuitiveness as a living, breathing rock outfit allowed the songs — already impressive in their own right — to add textures and morph into the eerie, fragmented shapes they are on record.

"Climbing Up the Walls," a schizophrenic meditation on the coming millennium, provided the evening's climax. Anchored by Colin Greenwood's throbbing bass, the haunting verses were bathed in warm blue and green lights, casting a shadow over much of the audience. During the ebullient chorus and bridge, the lights suddenly turned red, scrupulously framing the music's tumultuous mood.

Their only misstep came during the mid-point of the show in which they played a handful of new tracks of, their upcoming How Am I Driving? EP. The songs themselves were fine, showcasing a more plain-spoken direction, but the sold-out crowd was lost. The band rebounded strong, though, kicking into the plaintive rocker "Bones," following with the chaotic six-minute single "Paranoid Android" (which Yorke dedicated to Bill Gates). The crowd ate it up, reacting to the song's ebbs and flows, which were deftly accentuated by flashing strobes.

After closing the main set with the quiet beauty of "Street Spirit (Fade Out)," the band returned for

Orchestra to perform at Buckley

By Seema Gangasirkar
Collegian Staff

Twenty years after their last American tour, the Moscow Chamber Orchestra will perform tonight at Amherst College's Buckley Hall. The concert begins at 8 p.m.

The Moscow Chamber Orchestra, founded by violist Rudolf Barshai, has been performing to sold-out crowds since 1956. Since its inception, the Chamber Orchestra has had a reputation of attracting the best musicians in Moscow. Some of the legendary musicians who have performed with the Chamber Orchestra include David Oistrach, Mstislav Rostropovich, Leonid Kogan, Yehudi Menuhin and Sviatoslav Richter.

In addition to boasting a roster of distinguished names, the Moscow Chamber Orchestra has also won many prizes for their excellence. The Orchestra's interpretation of the complete Mozart Symphonies are collector's items, while many of its recordings of Vivaldi, Corelli, Albinon and Boccherini are a must-have for any classical music lover.

The Moscow Chamber Orchestra last performed in the United States back in 1978. Its current U.S. tour will cover 30 cities in nearly two months.

Tonight's program includes Shostakovich's Symphony No. 14 with soprano Arax Davtian and bass Gennadi Piniazhin. Also on the program is Mozart's Symphony No. 29 in A Major, K 201.

The Orchestra will perform under the baton of Constantine Orbelian, a San Francisco native and the only American ever to lead the Orchestra. In the past, Orbelian, an accomplished pianist, has performed with some of the world's leading orchestras, including the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Moscow State Symphony.

Soprano Arax Davtian has been described by the St. Paul Star Tribune as having "the kind of voice that is in short supply these days: a dark, rather mezzo-like tone but with an extended top register more typical of a coloratura soprano — a weighty voice that can move. And she uses her voice for delicate, subtle effects."

Tickets for the concert are $5 for students, $14 for senior citizens and $16 for the general public. For more information, please call the Box Office at 542-2195.

L.A. Confidential on deck for Monday

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

The steamy film noire L.A. Confidential just won't go away, even if few have seen it. Released last September, brought back for an Oscar run this winter, and playing this Monday night in the Campus Center Auditorium, last year's most intriguing movie perhaps suffers from an impatient audience used to grasping film plots in the coming attractions. The most common response after viewing the motion picture is, "It was good, but what was it about?"

This can be partly excused, however. L.A. Confidential, based on the sweeping crime novel by James Ellroy, does contain one of the more complex stories around. It doesn't help that halfway through the film the case at hand, a massacre at a night cafe, seems to be solved, only to be reopened again by cops Russell Crowe and Guy Pierce. In the end, no one character can be called "good." The movie is a testament to the fact that everyone has a dark, greedy side.

Especially in Los Angeles circa 1950, if not even more so today. We think of the 1950s and conjure up images of white picket fences and Donna Reed in the kitchen; in L.A., the land of fame and fortune, your dreams are supposed to come true as soon as you step onto the Hollywood backlots.

Beneath the glossy surface of Los Angeles, though, lies a world of corruption, sleaze, murder and mystery. No one is who they seem to be. L.A. Confidential achieves this theme on many levels — the characters themselves, the crime, the hookers led by Kim Basinger cut up to look like movie stars, and Danny DeVito's magazine, Hush-Hush.

The film swept all of the major critics awards for best picture but was passed over by the Academy, who only compensated with a best supporting actress award for Ms. Basinger and best adapted screenplay.

L.A. Confidential was largely made by underdogs who pulled off chameleon acts of their own. Director Curtis Hanson was a strictly hired-hand, and while his The Hand That Rocks the Cradle and The River Wild were solid features, they didn't exactly break any new ground. The same goes for co-screenwriter Brian Helgeland — he also scripted the inept Conspiracy Theory and The Postman. And while Crowe and Pierce will have no trouble finding work these days, the Australian actors were stuck in character– actor chaos a year previously.

"I'm the king of the world!" exclaimed James Cameron after sweeping the Oscars, imitating Leonardo DiCaprio's cry in Titanic. Ironically, the last lines of L.A. Confidential, spoken by Ms. Basinger, describe how some men get the world, and some get a nice home and family in Arizona. So Cameron may climb atop the Hollywood power list, while Hanson will stay comfortably in his own territory, quietly making films that challenge audiences — those who wish to be challenged — for a long time.

L.A. Confidential will be screened on Monday at 8 p.m., following a performance by Not Ready for Bedtime Players, and again at 10:30 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

a generous four- song encore, highlighted by an arena–adapted run through "Fake Plastic Trees" which emphasized the song's soft/loud dynamic and squalling wall–of–guitar noise.

Spiritualized turned in an equally strong opening set of spaced–out grooves and hallucinogenic melodies. While their stoic stage presence might not provide much to look at, their richly textured songs provided an aural feast. "Cop Shoot Cop," their traditional set closer, was played first and was presented in a more straightforward manner due to obvious time constraints.

Augmented with a harmonica on the awe–inspiring "I Think I'm In Love," Jason Pierce gave the song more of a blues feel than on record. A robust eight plus minutes in length, the song was like a pot of water on a stove — slowly simmering until just the right moment, releasing a sparkling prism of unexpected tones and beguiling melodicism.

work on in practice, we should be able to do well," Massachusetts coach Dan McOsker said.

Defense will also continue to be a factor for UMass heading into the New England Championships. The Front and Lanes defense has worked to perfection this season, because it frustrates the opposing teams who are unable most of the time to work the ball past mid–pool.

Goalie Peggy Nieves is one of the keys to this defense because on the rare occasions the opposing teams do get through the defense Nieves is their to make the stop. Nieves carries a 1.46 goals against average into New England's.

"Our defense has been one of the mainstays and if everyone plays as a team and all the people in the pool believe in one another, then this defense will continue to produce the results that it has in the past," McOsker said.

The offensive attack should be strong as well, as they bring great balance to each match. Players like Katie Grogan, who now has 68 goals including her two against Harvard this past Saturday, will lead the way. Grogan leads the team in scoring, but the strength of the offensive attack lies in its depth.

Andrea Vazquez is second on the team in scoring with 42 goals, three coming against Harvard. Sophomore Marcie Hupp, a huge weapon for the team offensively, has scored 39 goals, including five against Harvard.

"The offense has really started to click, once we got them believing in each other. Then the offense just kind of fell into place," McOsker said.

■ softball

After another run passed home plate, Henderson (13 strikeouts, 700 career strikeouts) buckled down to retire three straight batters by means of the strikeout. A quirky seventh inning ensued for the Minutewomen, but UMass was able to squeak the 3–2 win by Harvard.

In the nightcap, however, the Crimson were only able to get one runner on base after the first inning, as freshman Carrie Jeffries pitched a three–hit, five–strikeout gem in their 2–0 victory. After allowing runners to reach second and third base in the first inning, Jeffries kept Harvard in check, retiring the side in order in five of the last six innings.

For UMass coach Elaine Sortino, these two games were necessary tests towards the evolution of a toughened team ready for the imminent postseason run. In that same vein, her freshman hurler has become toughened as well.

"Carrie pitched one of her best games of the year," Sortino said. "We went through some videotape with her and that really helped her see what she's been doing. She's a great pitcher and it was a great game to prove that.

"Our team played well, but we added a lot of drama to the games. We made a lot of mistakes, but we did shut the door. These kind of games will only help us in the end."

Like every college freshman, Jeffries (8–5, 1.15 ERA) has dealt with a rollercoaster of emotions this entire year, but the Placentia, Ca., native believes she has turned the corner.

"I tried not to press out there today and just relax," Jeffries said. "I really hit my spots today. I'm definitely beginning to settle down, which has been a problem for me this season and I'm more confident because of that."

The Minutewomen got on the board in the opener in the fourth inning off of a fielder's choice, as junior Katie Kenderski was able to beat the throw home from third base. After Galas was thrown out at home on a grounder by junior Becky George, Osier scored on a single to center field by Buckley for the game winner. George's single to left field to score Osier in the fifth inning gave the Minutewomen their insurance run in the eventual 2–0 win.

tition.

This year, the Minutewomen as a team struggled with consistency. In the Regionals, they finished fourth in a field of seven. A sub par uneven bars performance bogged the Minutewomen down, like it had as the season progressed. After two events, they were placed second behind eventual winner Penn State, but faltered on bars and beam. Freshman Mary Moore's injury on the bar routine perhaps diminished the confidence of the squad going into beam rotation, but then Mosby killed all inquiries by nailing the event.

An unsuccessful try in Los Angeles might be a disappointment for the duo, but they realize that there are plenty of years to come to bounce back and become a national champion.

losing to Virginia Tech by, yes, 6–1. Todd Cheney played well in the tournament, earning an All–Conference team selection.

Looking to help increase the Minutemen's chances of upsetting some teams this year will be sophomore Parsa Samii. Samii has shone this spring and has picked up five consecutive victories at the No. 4 singles spot to bring his overall spring record to 12–2. Samii was moved up the No. 4 position before the Colgate match, and has yet to lose at 4–0.

UMass will likely get a seed somewhere near last year's, but has the potential to upset some good teams. Senior Alejandro Aller will finish out his season as his presence will be sorely missed next year.

UM women's tennis finishes their season

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team will look wrap up their season this weekend when they travel to Blacksburg, Va. for the Atlantic–10 Championships. The Minutewomen last played at Williams College Tuesday in a tune–up for the championships.

UMass will have high hopes for good reason, bringing in a perfect 4–0 conference record this year. The Minutewomen have already defeated Temple (4–3), Fordham (7–0), La Salle (7–0) and Rhode Island (7–0).

In last season's conference championships, UMass drew the third seed and finished in the same place. After the Minutewomen defeated St. Bonaventure 4–0 in the opening round, they fell to No. 2 George Washington 5–2 in the semifinals and went on to edge out Xavier 4–3 to salvage third. One of the bright spots during the meet was senior Marie Christine Caron, who earned All–Conference honors.

UMass will look to return to their winning ways as they were doing earlier this month when they took three in a row, dominating Fordham, La Salle and URI. The Minutewomen all downed all three opponents by the score of 7–0.

■ men's lax

Offensively against Harvard, the Minutemen broke out of a two–game funk, notching 12 goals. Sophomore Jay Negus shined, posting a career–high four goals, including two in the final period.

"We went after their defense a little more than we have done in the past," Carnuella said. "We used a north–south mentality and it worked."

The Minutemen are a perfect 3–0 against Notre Dame, defeating the Irish 8–5 in the two teams' only meeting in South Bend. The three goal advantage marks the biggest margin of victory in the series that dates back to 1995. Then–sophomore Mike McKeefrey netted a career–high three goals in last year's battle with the Irish. WMUA 91.1 FM will be covering the game which begins at 1 p.m. starts.

On the UMass side of things, the offense continues to swing a hot bat. Muchie Dagliere has a 25–game hitting streak heading into the weekend, and his hitting over .400 this season. Doug Clark, Pete Gautreau, Shaun Skeffington and Brian Samela are all over .300, while as a team the Minutemen are hovering around the .330 mark.

However, the pitching staff will need to continue to provide solid innings as they have been doing lately. Bill Cooke (5–1), Ryan Cameron (3–3) and Jeff Puleri (3–1) should all see time on the hill, along with possible relief appearances from Travis Veracka (3–0) and Rich Hartman (2–0) should the starters get into trouble.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — A close friend may be pressuring you to do something you've considered unwise for quite some time. Why give in now? Discuss this openly.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Take care that you're not trying to withhold information today for the wrong reasons. Sometimes, a secret can be beneficial — but right now?

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You can wipe out any fears you may have had about embarking on a new and exciting professional journey today. Get started soon!

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Do things in the right order today and you should be able to do more than you had planned. Tonight, you'll want to be there for a friend.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Take advantage of a little extra time you may have on your hands today. There are things you've let slide recently; focus on them now.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Tension may arise between you and a partner today, but there is no reason for you to make things worse by trying to assign blame.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Your internal clock may have you doing things at odd times all day long, but you can take full advantage of this improvisational schedule.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — There are certain things that will not wait today, and you must be willing to tend to these key issues as they arise.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Though you may think it's business as usual today, there are certain aspects of routine endeavors which may offer unusual challenges.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Do not hesitate to supply what you can today when a friend asks you for something special. This favor will be considered more than personal.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — A recent change may have you reassessing your entire outlook at this time. There is no reason for you to do things just because others ask.

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — Conflicting motives may come between you and a friend today, but only temporarily. Frank talk about a few key points can ease tensions.

Water polo in championship

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The No. 6 Massachusetts women's water polo team will be heading to Middletown, Conn., this weekend to compete in the New England Championships tomorrow and Sunday. They most recently defeated No. 20 Harvard for the second straight time, 16–2.

UMass heads into the championships with a record of 21–3 and remain undefeated in Collegiate Water Polo Association play. The women will be the number one seed for this tournament and depending how well they fare, will set up their seeding for Easterns.

The teams UMass will contend with include Wesleyan University, MIT and Harvard. These are all teams that UMass has handled easily all season. A top three finish would qualify the women for the Eastern Championships which are scheduled to be held next weekend in College Park, Md.

The Minutewomen are the defending champions of the New England region and this year's improved team will attempt to once again bring the title to Amherst.

The schedule for the Minutewomen includes a game against the No. 10 seed tonight. Tomorrow, UMass will play the No. 7 seed at 1 p.m. and the No. 4 seed at 4:30 p.m. The title game is slotted for Sunday afternoon at 1 p.m.

The Minutewomen carry a 13-game winning streak into this tournament, and hope that their success continues.

Women's lax to host 'Cuse

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

After the dust had cleared at Hofstra Stadium on Wednesday evening, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, which had managed to acquire a 2–1 record over three questionable games, had finally put it all together — just before their game Sunday against Syracuse at 1 p.m. on Totman Field.

UMass pummeled the bookends of the three game stretch, UConn and St. Joseph's, but did so more because they were the superior team than the fact that they played flawless lacrosse. The matchup in the middle, against Dartmouth, ended with a decisive 16–7 deficit on the scoreboard.

Finally, as the last second ticked off the clock in New York on Wednesday, the Minutewomen knew that they were prepared to face the critically important roll-call of games that end the season.

"It was a nail biter," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "It was a great game. We paid much more attention to the details that we had gotten away from. We worked hard in practice on our midfield denial defense. They were more patient on offense, and Jen Nardi came in and played a great game. They're starting to learn how to win, and they know how to pull out a one-point win."

Stephanie Pavlick's fourth goal of the game, with :35 to go in the game, upped the Massachusetts overall mark to 6–3. The goal was the final score in a 9–8 barn-burner.

"We changed one of our setup offenses, which happened to be to one of Pavlick's strengths — one-on-one," McClellan said. "We set her up for that, and she took advantage of that. She had four goals and an assist."

Pulling out a one-point win might call for a lot of scoring on UMass' part against this Sunday's opponent, Syracuse. The Orangewomen, who are in their inaugural season, are not to be taken lightly despite their youth.

"They're the highest scoring team in the country," McClellan said. "It's all relative to the competition, of course, but we're going to have to prepare hard for them."

The Minutewomen certainly can put points on the board, but have to be running on all cylinders. Pavlick, junior Laura Koruz, and freshman Fay Naher all provide serious firepower for the UMass offense.

As far as shutting down Syracuse is concerned, that duty will rest on the shoulders of a group of young, but talented defenders. One member of the tag team of freshman goalies, Jen Nardi or Tara Durkin, will face the Orangewomen's shots, and sophomore Jessica Passanese, Lynne Young and Melissa Miele will try to make those shots few and far between.

The outcome of this upcoming game will go a long way to deciding whether or not the Minutewomen can pull into the postseason for the first time in eight years.

Softball's pitching leads the way

By Jorma Kansanen

Before yesterday afternoon's doubleheader between the Massachusetts and Harvard University softball teams at Totman Field, there was a debate on which would be more unpredictable — the weather conditions or the competitive condition of the Crimson.

With a 20–17 record and an undefeated mark in the Ivy League, two games against a tough Harvard squad could have gone either way for the Minutewomen (27–12), but in the end, all was good in Valley Land. With the skies threatening downpours, both teams were contained on the scoreboard, with UMass pulling out 3–2 and 2–0 wins over the Crimson (20–19), respectively.

What could not be contained was the continuing run of senior co-captain Tracy Osier — literally. Osier stole three bases on the afternoon to eclipse her own single season record of 24, while also going 4-for-6 at the plate.

In the opener, junior pitcher Danielle Henderson's streak of not allowing an earned run since a 6–5 loss to Indiana University on Feb. 28 ended in the sixth inning. For the past 122 innings, Henderson was perfect in the ERA column, but that streak concluded with sophomore Deborah Abeles' double that scored junior Karen Rice from second base.

Men's lax to meet Fighting Irish

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

This weekend in South Bend, the No. 10 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team and the Notre Dame Fighting Irish will be on the same page, knowing that this game will dictate the rest of the season — whether it be at home or on the playing field.

Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella calls the matchup with the Irish a "must-win situation" as UMass (6–3) has dropped three in a row for the first time since 1985. Notre Dame is also sliding, losers of two straight.

"We can't be looking into the future, we have to be worrying about this game," Cannella said. "The first quarter of this game is going to be crucial. We need to come out focused."

Cannella's concerns date back to the last two games in which the Minutemen have been outscored 13–3 in the first frame. Wednesday against Harvard, the Crimson ran off six uncontested goals to shake UMass before the Minutemen came storming back, eventually losing 13–12 on a late goal.

Last year, the Irish nearly knocked off the Minutemen at home, falling 6–5, despite being outshot 38–12. Cannella credits Irish senior goalie Alex Cade for keeping the game close. He expects more from Cade this weekend.

"Alex is definitely one of the top goalies in the country," Cannella said. "Notre Dame's going to put forth a great defensive effort, like they always do."

The Irish (4–5) are not the same team this year. With only two losses in the regular season (Loyola, UMass) last year, the Irish returned only one starter from last year's defense that allowed only eight goals on average. Senior All-America candidate Todd Rassas has been the saving grace for Notre Dame, keeping that average roughly the same.

The UMass defense has taken a shot in the arm in the past three games. Being regarded as one of the top defenses in the country, opposing offenses have lit up the Minutemen for an average of 13 goals.

"We're going to change things up in practice," Cannella said. "We are going to work hard to prepare, we've prided ourselves in doing so, so we should be all right for Sunday."

UM baseball to host Rams in crucial series

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

If the Massachusetts baseball team is going to claim the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division title and the top seed in the A-10 tournament which is slated for early May, then the Minutemen will have to take care of business this weekend in a crucial three-game series against second place Fordham University at Earl Lorden Field (tomorrow 12 p.m.– doubleheader, Sunday, 12 p.m. –single game).

UMass (18–8, 8–1 Atlantic 10) will enter the series with a two-game lead over the Rams. The Minutemen have been on a roll as of late, as they are winners of 13 of their last 16, including a 7–6 thriller over Northeastern yesterday in which they came back to score three times in the ninth to upend the Huskies.

The Minutemen swept a three-game set from the Rams last year in the Bronx, and used that series to distance themselves from the rest of the pack in the A-10 East. A sweep again over the Rams this weekend would likely do the same, as the Minutemen would hold a five game lead over Fordham with only six conference games left to play in the season. UMass also has the luxury of playing Rhode Island and St. Bonaventure, two teams in the lower tier of the division, in those six contests.

Yet there is a reason why they play the games and why things aren't always as they seem on paper. The Rams have taken two out of three in each of their conference series this year (vs. Virginia Tech, St. Joe's and St. Bonaventure), and are coming off an 8–4 win over Wagner.

Leading the way for Fordham will be junior outfielder Tom Stein, who is hitting .441 with eight homers and 34 RBI. Adrian Muys is also hitting at a .424 clip, and leads the Rams with 11 doubles. All-Atlantic-10 Tournament shortstop Tony Martelli is back up the middle, and is at the .340 mark with eight doubles.

The Fordham pitching staff will be anchored by junior right-hander Mike Antico, who is 4–1. Gary Reznick who sports a 3–2 record and a 3.35 ERA, and sophomore southpaw Kris Kozlowski, who is 1–3 with a 3.28 ERA in eight

It's not often that a university can boast two national champions in the same year, never mind the same weekend, but that feat could be accomplished as two members of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will take their skills to Los Angeles for the NCAA National Championships.

Sophomore Mandy Mosby and freshman Jill Fisher both bought their chance for glory by qualifying for the nationals by winning individual events at the Northeast Regional in Pittsburgh on April 4. Mosby captured the balance beam title with a 9.850, while Fisher defeated the field with a 9.950 on floor.

Mosby has been a consistent performer all year in the all- around. In some earlier meets, she had some difficulty on the beam, which resulted in frequent falls, but has rebounded to represent Amherst in the Nationals.

Fisher is perhaps the story of the season for Coach Dave Kuzara's squad. A native of Dix Hills, N.Y., Fisher goes into the Nationals as the second-ranked floor performer in the country, behind defending national floor champion, Kim Arnold, of Georgia. She has registered a 9.900 or better in six of eight regular season meets. Her efforts include a perfect ten against West Virginia and MIT.

Minutewomen gymnastics has garnered three national champions in the past. In 1973, the team won the first ever national title for the school. Tammy Marshall followed nearly 20 years later by nabbing the 1992 national vault crown and then shocked the nation with her perfect 10 to win the 1993 floor exercise compe-

Rested men's tennis heads into A–10's

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis will be well rested going into the Atlantic 10 Championships this weekend in Blacksburg, Va., as they have a week and a half to prepare themselves both physically and mentally.

UMass will be well rested and fresh this weekend as they try to finish off their season in style. The Minutemen last competed April 6 against Fairfield, using the Stags as a tuneup for the championships and defeating them soundly, 6–1.

That win mirrored their previous at Seton Hall by the same score. In fact, 6–1 has been a familiar score for UMass all season, defeating A–10 opponents Rhode Island and Fordham by five and losing to Temple and George Washington likewise.

The Minutemen received a few extra days off from competition after their home meet with Tufts was rained out April 8, leaving them at 5–5 on the spring season and 11–6 overall. UMass hopes to finish what it has been working toward all season and see those 6–1 scores on their side this weekend.

The men would like to improve on last year's fourth place finish at the championship meet, after they had been entered at the four seed. UMass beat fifth-seeded St. Bonaventure before

UM crew ready for battle

By Aaron M. Saykin

While a two-week absence from competition may have been the perfect tonic for the Massachusetts women's crew team, it may spell disaster for its three opponents this weekend.

As a result of extra preparation time, UMass coach Jim Dietz feels that Northeastern, Columbia and Villanova may have a difficult time keeping pace with a Minutewomen team which has something to prove after enduring a four tenths of a second defeat to the University of Virginia on April 4.

"I'm hoping for a big weekend. We've had some time to practice and look at the personnel in the boats," Dietz said. "Against Northeastern, we are going to want to take them by six to eight seconds to show we can dominate them."

In the first of their two races this weekend, UMass will travel to Boston tomorrow, where they hope to topple the host Huskies and the guest Lions. As an in-state rivalry, Dietz feels that consistent victories over Northeastern has a significant impact on the program.

"Northeastern is always a big one," he said. "We're competing with them for the athletes that are going to row college next year."

Following the race, the Minutewomen will travel to Camden, New Jersey where they hope to tame the Wildcats during their Sunday competition.

"Villanova is an up–and–coming team," Dietz said. "They get stronger all the time. That race will also help us out the following weekend, because the [Atlantic 10 Championships] are held along the same river. It gives the coxswains the experience of knowing the course."

Although his squad is accustomed to only one race per weekend, Dietz is not concerned by the consecutive day competition.

"Our women should be able to handle it," he said. "It's all about preparation, and we have had two weeks worth of it for this weekend. In the NCAA finals, you have to be ready to row in consecutive days."

Although the Minutewomen hope to improve upon their 1997 NCAA Silver Medal, they remain encouraged after their loss to the nationally acclaimed Cavaliers, and view the defeat as a hurdle in their path to a NCAA top finish.

"Last year they beat us by three seconds during the regular season, but by the end we were six to eight seconds ahead of them in the Nationals," said the fourth–year coach. "We get much stronger as the season progresses."

Russian standoff over personalities

MOSCOW (AP) — The candidate at the center of the battle between Russia's president and parliament assured the United States yesterday that the fight will not hinder his country's free market reforms.

President Boris Yeltsin's nominee for prime minister, Sergei Kiriyenko, told Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott that the standoff is over personalities, not policy.

"Our course for the continuation of reforms remains unchanged," Kiriyenko said.

A major goal of U.S. relations with Russia has been to ensure the progress of free-market reforms. Kiriyenko's remarks were clearly intended to allay any U.S. concerns that may have arisen as a result of the latest turmoil.

He told Talbott the new Cabinet would ensure the implementation of accords reached between Vice President Al Gore and Chernomyrdin as well as other U.S.-Russian agreements, the Interfax news agency reported.

Big universities favor research, not students

WASHINGTON (AP) — Big universities too often neglect their undergraduates in favor of research, even though undergraduates pay a big share of the costs, says an independent report released yesterday.

"Baccalaureate students are the second-class citizens who are allowed to pay taxes but are barred from voting, the guests at the banquet who pay their share of the tab but are given leftovers," said the report from the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

The panel of scholars and some outsiders assembled by the nonprofit organization found that undergraduate students are often taught by badly trained or untrained teaching assistants, not the famous professors touted in the catalogs or recruiting materials, and many students graduate without "a coherent body of knowledge."

Few have access to what distinguishes the research universities from liberal arts colleges: the access to a diverse, interdisciplinary opportunities for experience-based education. The report, "Reinventing Undergraduate Education: A Blueprint for America's Research Universities," said universities should involve more undergraduates in those research projects, whether in medicine or the humanities, beginning with freshmen.

Clergy panel to speak

Response to the "Friends of Jesus" table

By Dylan Larke
Collegian Staff

A panel of clergy from various religious traditions will be speaking on Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, and Transgender (GLBT) issues tonight in room 162 of the Campus Center at 7 p.m.

The panel will be jointly sponsored by the University of Massachusetts GLBT group Pride Alliance and the Stonewall Center, a UMass GLBT resource center.

The panel is made up of clergy from Amherst, Northampton, and UMass religious groups. It will include UMass chaplain Reverend Chris Carlisle. Also among those speaking will be Dean Clark from Amherst College Chaplaincy and Rabbi Eddie Feld from the Hillel Houses at Smith and Amherst Colleges.

This event is in response to the presence of the "Friends of Jesus" on the Campus Center concourse tomorrow and Thursday.

"The Friends of Jesus" are a group from Maine that set up a table on the Campus Center concourse last year under a large banner that read "What's Wrong with Homosexuality." They also distributed materials that both perpetuated false stereotypes and contained incorrect medical and statistical information.

"We thought it was important for the UMass community to hear other views on GLBT issues and religious life that embrace diversity and all sexual orientations," said junior philosophy major and Pride Alliance steering committee member Kate Geyer.

Many feel that the "Friends of Jesus" do not represent the views of all Christians.

Director of the Stonewall Center Felice Yeskel said, "The Friends of Jesus do not represent a mainstream Christian perspective on homosexuality. Their views are one among many. We are organizing a panel of clergy people to speak about the variety and diversity of religious viewpoints on gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgendered issues."

There have also been other events planned to respond to the Friends of Jesus. The Stonewall Center has organized many educational workshops that will be taking place in the Campus Center during the time that the Friends of Jesus will be on the concourse.

Tomorrow, there will be several workshops in Campus Center room 101. The workshops range from "Why This Heterosexual Woman is an Ally and Why You Should Be an Ally!" at 11 a.m. to noon, to "Homophobia in the Workplace" at 1–2 p.m. The workshops are intended to promote education and awareness of GLBT issues on our campus.

Also, on Thursday from noon to 3 p.m., the Safe Colleges Program for Gay/Lesbian Students Western Massachusetts Regional Workshop will be held in the Campus Center.

Kehoe visits UM to mark Holocaust Memorial Week

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

As part of Holocaust Memorial Week at the University of Massachusetts, author Louise Kehoe will present a discussion entitled "Hide and Seek: Reclaiming Jewish Identity After the Holocaust" at the Hillel House at 7 p.m. tonight.

The discussion is the fourth in the Hillel series "Making Choices on Loving, Living, and Dying."

Kehoe received the 1995 National Jewish Book Award for In This Dark House, a memoir of her family. The book chronicles Kehoe's personal search for her Jewish identity after discovering that her father had hid his own Jewish heritage from his family. Kehoe was to learn that her paternal grandparents, whom her father had left in Poland, had been taken to the Warsaw ghetto and later to concentration camps where they were killed.

The death of his parents during the Holocaust influenced Kehoe's father's decision to hide his Jewish identity from his children. Kehoe recognized the importance of the Holocaust in the lives of Jewish people in an article which ran in The New York Times entitled "What Being Jewish Means to Me" as part of a series by the American Jewish Committee.

"The Holocaust has always loomed large in my consciousness," Kehoe said. "For what happens to one Jew happens to all, and it is this very feeling of connectedness, of shared history and common experience, which makes being Jewish such a precious gift."

At forty, Kehoe began the process of reclaiming her identity by studying with a rabbi, learning basic Hebrew, studying Torah and attending synagogue services. The first part of her journey culminated with her formal conversion to Judaism.

Tonight, along with a slide show, Kehoe will present a lecture after which there will be time for questions and discussion.

Kehoe will also be speaking today at 1 p.m. in Herter 222 on conversion to Judaism for an open session of the course Jewish Christian Encounter. She will also join students for dinner at 5 p.m. in the Hillel House at the Kosher Dining Commons.

Other Holocaust Memorial Week activities included last nights's showing of the movie Swing Kids at the Hillel House. Tomorrow's presentation by UMass professor of English and Judaic Studies James Young entitled "Portrayals of the Holocaust" will be followed by the movie A Return to Auschwitz at the Hillel House. The presentation will start at 5 p.m. and the movie will start at 7 p.m. A campus–wide Holocaust memorial service will be held Thursday at the campus pond at 6:30 p.m.

Cultural night a hit

Students entertained by music and dance

By Edgar A. Barros
Collegian Staff

The Cape Verdean Student Alliance (CVSA) held its annual cultural night Saturday, April 18. The night was made up of a diverse program which included dancers, speakers, a live band and recognition of graduating seniors.

There were three dance performances by two dance groups, "The Boston Dance Group" and CVSA's own "Batukeras." The dancers entertained the crowd as they were presented with different types of dances which are part of the Cape Verdean culture.

"I liked the dancers, they were cool," said University of Massachusetts sophomore Maegan Katz.

"I don't get to see stuff like that except here at UMass. I had never heard of Cape Verdeans before I came here. It was a learning experience," Katz, who is from New Jersey, said.

The night also included a speech by George Andrade, a senior at the University of Connecticut. He spoke on issues concerning the race and identity of Cape Verdeans. "Even though I am light–skinned, I consider myself a black man first, then I'm a Cape Verdean," Andrade said.

Three hundred guests, from on and off–campus attended the event. There were no fights at the event, which was a good thing according to junior Jose Teixeira. "It was good to see a lot of Cape Verdeans in one place in harmony."

Guests from all different backgrounds, race and ethnicity attended the event, and took part in the festivities. "All in all it was a good turnout; a lot of people came. It was good to see people from all different cultures having a good time," explained freshman Cipriano Andrade. "It was good watching not only Cape Verdeans dancing to Cape Verdean music, but also African Americans, West Indians, European Americans, Latinos, and so on and so on."

The guests also heard a presentation by Cecilia DeAndrade. She presented and explained different Cape Verdean music and dances. DeAndrade educated the guests on the history, origin, and cultures behind the different Cape Verdean styles of music and dance.

"It was really enlightening to learn about the different styles of Cape Verdean music, their origin, and the different cultures which has influenced our music and dance," said Maritsa Barros, an off–campus guest at the Cape Verdean Cultural Night.

The night ended with an attempted performance by a Brockton based "Cola Band." Due to a power shortage, they could not perform for a period of time. The music was then provided by the disc jockey, Jose Aroujo.

Sophomore Jose Brandao said, "This event gave all the UMass students in attendance [a chance] to learn more about our culture."

Jury rules anti–abortion groups used violence to close clinics

By Mike Robinson
Associated Press

CHICAGO — In an unusual use of a racketeering law designed to fight the mob, a federal jury ruled last Tuesday that anti-abortion protest organizers used threats and violence to shut down clinics — a verdict that could cost the movement millions.

Although the abortion foes were ordered to pay only about $258,000, the class-action ruling opened the door for more claims by as many as 1,000 clinics across the country.

"This is the biggest courtroom defeat for the anti-abortion movement ever," declared Fay Clayton, an attorney for the National Organization for Women, which filed the lawsuit in 1986.

Defense attorneys said they will appeal.

The jury found that anti-abortion activist Joseph Scheidler and two associates, Timothy Murphy and Andrew Scholberg, engaged in 21 acts of extortion to shut down clinics. The jury also found that two anti-abortion organizations, the Pro-Life Action League and Operation Rescue, were part of the scheme.

The jury ordered the three activists and two organizations to pay $85,926.92 in damages, which will be tripled under the racketeering law.

The damages were awarded to abortion clinics in Milwaukee and Wilmington, Del., for security measures required after violence flared outside their doors. But a number of other clinics intend to file for class-action damages under the verdict.

"They want to bankrupt us — there's no question about that," said Scheidler, executive director of the Pro-Life Action League. A turning point in the case came in 1994 when the U.S. Supreme Court reversed

Following the presentation, he will be presented with the Eleanor Bateman award. A reception will close the evening event, and those in attendance will have the opportunity to meet with the Bateman Scholar.

The Scholar in Residence program was named after Eleanor Bateman, founder of the Trustees of the University Building Association. The program was established in 1989 to recognize distinguished alumni through campus visits, lectures, workshops, and seminars for undergraduate and graduate students.

According to its mission statement, "the goal of the Eleanor Bateman Alumni Scholar in Residence Program is to provide students with alumni role models who exemplify the achievements of the University's mission through public service and professional accomplishments."

Meers received his bachelor's degree in hotel, restaurant, and travel administration (HRTA) and was a member of the football team while here at UMass. During the early days of his career, Meers worked for General Foods and Wilson Sporting Goods. From 1980–1984, he owned Bancroft Sporting Goods, a manufacturer of tennis rackets and Tretorn tennis shoes.

He became a Reebok representative in 1981, and eventually sold his business to join Reebok in 1984 as senior vice president of sales and marketing. Reebok sales at this time went from about $15 million to $66 million. He has also assumed the position as president of North America Operations, director of sales and distribution of Reebok products in the U.S. and Canada.

Today marks the first official visit Meers has made to UMass. Intended to act as an inspiration for what future graduates should strive to achieve, the program is intended to recognize such scholarly individuals.

As Alumni Events Coordinator Michele Girard–Basora said, "we are very proud of Mr. Meers' accomplishments and pleased that he has generously

Smoking bill postponed

By Sonya Ross
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Hoping to inject new energy into a sputtering bid for tobacco regulation, President Clinton urged lawmakers yesterday to abandon their doubts and pass strict anti-smoking legislation now.

"We must not let this opportunity slip away," he said. In a Rose Garden statement punctuated with criticisms of big tobacco, the president said the highest priority for lawmakers should be preventing an estimated 3,000 children from smoking this year — not easing the economic impact regulation would have on cigarette manufacturers.

"All these children have been targeted by a massive, multimillion-dollar media campaign that preys on their insecurities and their dreams," Clinton said. "We have an opportunity and an obligation now to put aside politics, to turn aside the pleas of special interests, to act in the interest of the health of generations of our children."

The legislation, proposed by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., would codify a settlement reached last year between the tobacco industry and state attorney generals to help states recover the costs of treating smoking-related illnesses and help tobacco companies shield themselves from future lawsuits.

But the McCain bill would cost cigarette makers an estimated $516 billion over 25 years, much more than the settlement would. Tobacco companies now oppose the McCain measure, saying the cost would be tens of billions of dollars higher than originally intended.

The president decried the industry's reversal, saying the country has a responsibility to put a stop to "predatory practices by tobacco companies that have targeted our children."

"I believe the majority of American people and, indeed, the majority of Congress... will see this for what it is: a tobacco industry smokescreen," the president said.

But tobacco companies said the youth smoking issue is getting lost in a rush to cast tobacco as evil for political purposes and to generate extra tax dollars for a new government bureaucracy." No one can say the industry has not made an extraordinary effort to address the issue," said Scott Williams, spokesman for the five major tobacco firms. "They brought unprecedented resources, beyond what had ever been proposed, and what happened? People felt it was easy to beat up on the tobacco industry."

In the Senate, where the tobacco legislation is mired in wide-ranging disputes, Majority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., indicated little interest in the lower-court rulings and gave NOW permission to refile the lawsuit under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. It was the first nationwide class-action lawsuit ever filed against the anti-abortion movement under RICO.

Congress passed the law in 1970 as a weapon against organized crime, but in recent years businesses have also become targets of its civil provisions.

Defense attorney Tom Brejcha said that RICO never should have been used in the case. "RICO is terribly flawed, vague and over broad," he said.

Abortion-rights forces won a lawsuit several years ago against blockade organizers under the RICO act in Philadelphia. But Clayton said that verdict was minor by comparison.

U.S. District Judge David Coar scheduled a hearing for tomorrow at which he is expected to discuss a court order to curb violence at clinics.

Coar barred abortion-rights attorneys from introducing evidence that they claimed would tie the defendants to more than a decade of bombings and arsons at clinics around the country. But he allowed them to tell jurors of doctors and patients being grabbed, pushed, struck with protest signs and threatened.

Arkansas murders spark new gun control laws

By Jim Abrams
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Gun control advocates are using the Arkansas school shooting to press a reluctant Republican Congress to take up bills that would ban the sale of some ammunition clips and require safety locks on guns.

Since the March 24 school ambush in Jonesboro, Ark., that left five dead, gun control advocates have introduced legislation that would close a loophole in the 1994 Crime Control Act and ban the sale of all ammunition clips of more than 10 rounds. Another bill would impose criminal penalties on adults who don't properly store or have safety locks on a firearm that a child uses to harm others. President Clinton, meanwhile, issued an executive order permanently banning importation of 58 assault-style weapons modified to skirt 1994 restrictions on such firearms.

Supporters of each measure cited Jonesboro in stressing the urgency for action. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) said the boys accused of the Arkansas shootings used a 15-round ammunition magazine. Sens. Richard Durbin (D-Ill.) and John Chafee (R-R.I.) said the boys allegedly stole their weapons from one boy's relative, and their child access bill would hold that adult accountable.

The guns used at Jonesboro are not covered by Clinton's extended ban, but White House Press Secretary Mike McCurry said the president acted "within the context of a nation that is still grieving" from the incident.

But opponents of gun control said it was wrong to use gun incidents for political purposes.

"People are talking about the breakdown of the family, about gratuitous violence on television," said Wayne LaPierre, executive vice president of the National Rifle Association. "We ought to be looking at this as a tragedy rather than trying to make political hay out of it."

"Those who advocate gun control are exploiting the terrible grief surrounding the tragedy in Jonesboro," said Sen. Larry Craig (R-Idaho).

Defense claims politics influenced charges in Italian cable car deaths

By Estes Thompson
Associated Press

CAMP LEJEUNE, N.C. — Politics influenced the decision to charge the four-member crew of a Marine jet that sliced a gondola cable in Italy and killed 20 people, a defense lawyer said yesterday as a military hearing began.

"There is certainly enough (evidence) to indicate at this point that what has happened thus far is a function of political pressure," civilian lawyer Frank Spinner, who represents the pilot, Capt. Richard Ashby, said after the hearing.

The four crewmen have been charged with involuntary manslaughter and negligent homicide in the Feb. 3 deaths. They are also charged with dereliction of duty, destruction of military property and destroying civilian property.

Yesterday's hearing was the administrative phase of an Article 32 hearing — the military equivalent of a civilian grand jury. Once the evidentiary phase is complete, a judge or investigative officer will recommend whether there should be a court-martial.

The Marine EA-6B Prowler jet was on a training run Feb. 3 when it sliced the cable used by the gondola at an Alpine ski resort, sending the car crashing into the slopes.

The incident enraged Italians and has strained Italian-American relations, sparking protests at the U.S. air base in Aviano where the jet was stationed. Many Italians have called on their government to close U.S. bases throughout the country and charge that American fliers routinely "hot-dog" in Italian airspace. Spinner said that for decades, members of the military have been involved in training exercises that have caused deaths.

"And in many of those cases there have been acts of negligence, perhaps even recklessness, and there does not appear to be anyone who has been court-martialed previously under similar circumstances," he said.

Lt. Col. Ronald Rodgers, the judge, ruled that separate evidentiary hearings will be held for the back-seat crewmen — Capt. Chandler Seagraves and Capt. William Raney — and for Ashby and navigator Capt. Joseph Schweitzer.

Seagraves and Raney, who operated electronic jamming gear in the jet, will have their hearing on May 5. The hearing for Ashby and Schweitzer will be held June 15.

Dave Beck, the civilian lawyer for defendant Schweitzer, said the crewmen were not negligent.

"The question is, was there criminal negligence," said Beck. "We deny that there was."

Military lawyers for the prosecution and defense declined to comment after the hearing.

A Marine investigation board that worked closely with Italian officials has placed the blame for the tragedy on the four crew members, saying they broke rules on how fast and how low they could fly during their training maneuver.

The four crewmen have been put on a non-flying status since their return to the Marine Corps Air Station Cherry Point on March 14.

Justices reject challenge to anti-stalking laws

By Richard Carelli
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Dealing for the first time with anti-stalking legislation, the Supreme Court rejected sweeping challenges to laws in Virginia and the District of Columbia.

The court, acting without comment yesterday, turned away free-speech claims by two men convicted of stalking crimes after they threatened women — by phone or in letters — while in prison. Both men argued that the law used to prosecute them was too broad and too vague to let anyone know just what type of communication is criminal. Lower courts had rejected those arguments.

Since California enacted the first anti-stalking criminal statute in 1990, all 50 states have made stalking a crime. The outlawed conduct generally is defined as "directed at a specific person that involves repeated physical or visual proximity, nonconsensual communication or verbal, written or implied threats."

A recent Justice Department survey found a strong link between stalking and domestic violence, and indicated the problem is more widespread than once believed.

Yesterday's court action set no national precedent, and did not preclude the possibility that the justices someday may vote to review a challenge to an anti-stalking law.

In the Virginia case, Michael Parker was convicted and sentenced to six months in jail for a series of telephone calls he made to a woman with whom he once had a relationship. Court records say the woman testified that their relationship had been an "abusive" one.

Prosecutors said Parker made about 30 calls to the woman over a week-long period in March 1995. Seven times he left messages that included "It'll never end" and "I'll be out."

In upholding Parker's conviction, a Virginia appeals court said, "He violated the stalking statute because he made a barrage of calls...with the knowledge that the calls caused the victim to reasonably fear bodily injury at his hands."

In the District of Columbia case, Ros Jett was convicted and sentenced to five years in prison for sending sexually explicit, threatening letters from behind bars to a woman who helped run a liquor store he frequented.

His appeal urged the justices to determine just what kind of speech can be punished. "Uncertainty over the reach of stalking and harassment laws to prohibit speech has already caused considerable controversy, and that controversy is likely only to increase," Jett's appeal said.

Parker's appeal said the Virginia law could be used to prosecute purely innocent speech, and gave examples that included these:

• A doctor diagnoses a ruptured appendix and advises a patient that surgery is needed to avoid death. The doctor, later learning that the patient has not yet had the surgery, again delivers the warning and convinces the patient of the danger.

• A fireman runs through a hotel hall during a fire, shouting that all occupants must leave. He repeats the process, convincing a number of guests that they are in danger of suffering great harm or death.

The nation's highest court rejected two other appeals in free-speech cases. In one, the justices refused to scuttle a wrongful-death lawsuit against the publisher of a "how-to" book for killers.

Relatives of three people killed in Maryland in 1993 are suing Paladin Press of Boulder, Colo., over "Hit Man: A Technical Manual for Independent Contractors." James Perry followed the book's instructions when he committed the three murders in Silver Spring, Md.

The justices also let stand lower court rulings that restrict news interviews of jurors who participated in a Louisiana political corruption trial, rejecting a newspaper's appeal that called the restrictions an unconstitutional "prior restraint" of speech.

issue. When asked by reporters about the legislation, Lott feigned boredom with mock snoring."I don't think we know yet," Lott said of the bill's chances. He said he did not discuss the matter with key senators during Congress' two-week Easter break, but felt voters would not miss it if it were delayed until after the November elections.

But Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) said he is confident that Clinton's involvement in the issue would help speed things along.

"Republicans have to decide whether they want to be with those who have provided them with the mega-millions of dollars in campaigns or whether they want to be with the American people," Daschle said. "This provides them with their first opportunity to do the right thing in public policy and to work with us to find a comprehensive, balanced approach to tobacco policy in the future." McCain is expected to meet with White House chief of staff Erskine Bowles today to discuss what the president wants in the bill. McCain has said he is frustrated because Clinton has urged that the bill be made tougher but hasn't said how that can be done.

House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) said tax increases and regulatory powers any tougher than those proposed in McCain's bill would be too liberal to have much chance of House passage. Clinton said yesterday he hoped Gingrich would change his mind and support the legislation.

"Before his recent comments I had been encouraged, because he basically said he would not permit us to take a stronger position than he did," Clinton said. "I certainly hope he will return to his former position. We need everybody working together. We must not let this opportunity slip away."

Gingrich spokeswoman Christina Martin denied that the speaker is trying to water down McCain's bill, and he wants Congress to pass "landmark legislation to protect our children from the dangers of both tobacco and illegal drugs."

"No industry, no interest group, and no partisan political games will lessen our commitment or stand in our way," Martin said. "Our first and only goal should be protecting children's health and not using tobacco legislation to increase the size of big government."

Senior Republican aides, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Gingrich's comments did not represent any coordinated GOP effort at legislation, but rather a broad idea for a bill. Public health advocates said the speaker's attempt to devote tobacco money to a tax cut dodges the real issue.

Rebel radio

Across the country, little pirate radio stations are popping up. These stations differ in a number of ways: some are commercial, some are not; some devote their airtime to leftist political commentary, some exclusively play biker rock. But one thing unites these stations — all use low-power transmitters that are unlicensed by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC).

This is the micropower radio movement, a growing network of media libertarians who refuse to accept FCC regulations against them. Claiming that the FCC is violating their First Amendment rights to free speech, these illicit radio operators challenge unfair regulations by broadcasting anyway, using cheap and readily-available equipment.

"By forcing the courts to rule on issues of free speech, they take a stand for the right of individuals to produce and participate in mass communications technologies."

Daniel Bodah

There are at least two micropower stations in the Pioneer Valley. These stations are able to be more intimately involved with the communities they cover, since their broadcast range is usually less than five miles. Radio Free Allston, in Boston, actually received recognition and support from their local government for their place in the community.

Further adding to a climate of support for micropower radio in the country is the difficulties the FCC has had prosecuting their most prominent cases against pirate stations. Last November, in California, a Federal judge ruled in favor of Free Radio Berkeley (FRB), a micropower station that the FCC was trying to shut down. The judge insisted that the FCC must answer the constitutional issue of free speech in court, and could not claim jurisdiction themselves.

However, the National Association of Broadcasters (NAB) doesn't like any of this.

The NAB is one of the country's most powerful lobbies, a group consisting of the major communications corporations. They have reason to worry about the micropower radio movement — the issues raised by FRB in court are the only serious challenge to megacorps like Westinghouse gobbling up control of the FM band in all the major markets across the country. The landmark Telecommunications Act of 1996 cleared the way for this consolidation. Since its passage, 40 percent of the country's formerly 10,000 independently-owned radio stations have passed into the hands of the megacorps.

Now the NAB wants to crush the threat that ordinary people will have access to the media. They take such an interest that they supplied the FCC with their lawyers in the FRB case. The NAB also called Beverley Baker, the FCC's Chief of Compliance, to their national conference last June and demanded to know when the FCC was going to stop micropower radio.

In response to that urging, and the unfavorable decision in the FRB case, the FCC has launched a series of assaults. Last fall and winter they conducted an intimidation campaign in Florida, during which a multi-agency task force (consisting of Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, Federal Bureau of Investigations, FCC and even Central Intelligence Agency troops) raided three pirate stations in the Tampa area, battering down doors and holding DJs spread-eagled on the ground with M-16s while confiscating their equipment. The raids seem to have basically been a media campaign, since news media were invited to watch and broadcast the assaults, and no criminal charges related to unlicensed broadcasting were ever upheld in court.

Many long-term micropower stations also received their first notices to cease broadcasting from the FCC last winter. Radio Allston, according to some sources, decided to bow out and reorganize for a fight. Radio Mutiny in Philadelphia, who sent a delegation to do a presentation at Hampshire College recently, responded to theirs by holding a National Micropower Radio Conference in early April. At their conference they gave how-to workshops, legal information, and parties; they also turned their transmitter on in public after issuing the FCC a challenge to arrest them.

Most recently, Steal This Radio in New York City was threatened with a raid. The FCC claimed that there were interference complaints from a licensed station, but when contacted by Steal This Radio members, that station denied the problems. Steal This Radio decided to preempt any FCC action by forming a group called Free Speech, which is suing the FCC for violating their constitutional rights. On April 15th, they also switched their transmitter on at a public press conference held across the street from the New York Stock Exchange. Radio Free Allston and 87X, one of the Tampa stations shut down last winter, also went back on the air in solidarity.

The micropower radio movement is taking risks and actions that are vitally important as new communications technologies, such as a higher-speed Internet and digital radio, alter the ways we can receive information and keep in touch with the larger world. By forcing the courts to rule on issues of free speech, they take a stand for the right of individuals to produce and participate in mass communications technologies. After all, the airwaves are public property; as such, they should be ours to benefit from, and not the sole domain of large corporations looking to accumulate our money.

The long, hard journey

I have developed an unhealthy obsession for a man who walks down my street at the same time every day — the mailman.

You see, right now the mailman literally holds my future in his hands — and I'm not talking about some "You could already be a winner" sweepstakes. I'm talking about law school acceptance letters.

Laura Stock

Every day for the past month, I have had some form of an emotional catharsis or another on my front porch as I check the mail. I have made dozens of fruitless trips home from campus in the middle of the day in search of those promising thick envelopes — and dreading those thin ones.

In moments of panic about missing mail, I have angrily instructed my five housemates (one of whom is awaiting acceptance letters as well, exponentially increasing the anxiety level in my household) to leave all of the mail in one specific area of the kitchen table. I'm sure they really appreciate my anal-retentive perfectionist attitude towards the pile of junkmail we receive every day.

One particular housemate is under orders to call me at work when a law school letter arrives, and sometimes, read the contents of the missive over the phone. And the news is not always good.

Acceptances. Rejections. Waiting lists. Somebody stop this emotional roller coaster, because I want to get off. I don't remember this process being so hellish during high school. Probably because this time around, it matters more: I'm thinking in terms of employment, geography, in essence, my whole future. And when your future lies in a 10-by-12-inch manilla envelope, your sanity starts to erode.

"It does feel like I am delaying growing up by staying in school, in debt, and out of the working world — but it's scary as hell."

Of course, there is a certain amount of stress that comes with graduation for anyone. Now is the time of year you can tell a senior simply by facial expression. Excitement, and perhaps relief, about graduation combined with anxiety and fear of leaving the womb we called UMass for the last four years makes for a toxic emotional cocktail.

The ironic thing for me, and maybe for those of you continuing on to graduate school, is the notion that staying in school another three years is equivalent to a security blanket, protecting against the harsh nine-to-five, power suit, economic ladder-climbing "real world." This is definitely a fallacy.

Ever since the terrifying process began in September, I have doubted the practicality of my choices. While my peers were attending career fairs last semester, I was taking the LSAT. My fellow seniors were doctoring their resumes and creating cover letters while I was slaving over law school applications. And now, as my colleagues discuss 401K plans and starting salaries of $40,000 a year, I am still stressing over the FAFSA and filling out loan applications in amounts close to those starting salaries.

It does feel like I am delaying growing up by staying in school, in debt, and out of the working world — but it's scary as hell. All I hear, or even read about on these editorial pages, are first interviews, second interviews and job offers. But, for many graduates, their first job is a stepping stone down a career path formed as it is traversed.

I know job interviews are stressful, but you can accept, reject, or even fine-tune a job offer. Fortunately, the job market is healthy right now. Graduate programs remain highly competitive, and with so many applicants for so few spots, it is the sad truth that most prospective students do not choose their schools; the schools choose them.

I am aware I brought this stress on myself, and this whole emotionally, and economically, taxing process is inevitable for anyone who wants to become a lawyer, doctor, professor, etc. The strange thing is, if there are others out there going through the same psychological turmoil, I haven't heard much about it. An explanation for this probably lies in the fact that the people we are turning to for support in this endeavor, are the same ones we are competing against for coveted spots in graduate schools.

Since the LSAT, MCAT, GMAT and GRE are never going to disappear, and the whole application procedure will likely remain the same forever, I can offer no solution, save creating a support group to prevent eager letter recipients from going postal on their mailcarriers.

Letters to the Editor

Cover gymnastics

To the Editor:

Throughout the semester, I have read many articles in the sports section of the Collegian pertaining to many sports ranging from basketball to lacrosse. But why is it that gymnastics is hardly mentioned at all? Since December, both the men and women's gymnastics teams have been competing, yet the sports editors of the Collegian don't care. Perhaps they're not just inconsiderate and incompetent, but also unaware of the sport, so here goes: gymnastics requires agility, flexibility, concentration, strength and dedication. These men and women work for hours a day all week just like the "big" sports and deserve recognition.

Although they're not mentioned often, the editors [occasionally] reluctantly write a short article which comes off as just an attempt to fill space. Perhaps they don't know that Stephen Pryor broke the school all-around record, and then later topped that feat. And Andrew Leis tied the school Pommel Horse record. Also that Jill Fischer scored a perfect 10 and can't seem to get lower than a 9.9 on floor. Oh, I'm sorry, there was an article on Fischer, but it was over a week late... Thanks anyway. Recently, both the men and women's teams competed in NCAA regionals. This is one of the biggest meets of the year! Couldn't you say anything? Couldn't you mention that Mandy Mosby won beam with a 9.875 and Jill Fischer scored a 9.975, and both went on to compete in Nationals? And Andrew Leis scored a 9.65 on Pommel Horse, and Bryan McNulty scored a 9.6 on floor which qualified them both for Nationals?

Look, I understand that Kent, Moore, Hershey, Kandel, Sanyal, Colucci, and LaVallee aren't big names like Tyrone Weeks and Monty Mack, but some recognition would be appreciated. I think the Collegian owes them an apology, and future attention.

Football coverage inaccurate

To the Editor:

I wanted to correct a few errors made by Paul Teves in Thursday's article (4/16) concerning the relative merits of Peyton Manning vs. Ryan Leaf. In the article, he made several errors regarding Peyton Manning's career at the University of Tennessee, some of which he used to support his argument that Ryan Leaf would make a better professional football player.

First of all, Teves states that Peyton Manning was the quarterback of a Tennessee squad that lost to Penn State in the Fiesta Bowl two years ago. Peyton Manning never played a game against Penn State in his career at the University of Tennessee. In fact, the loss you are referring to occurred in 1992 and UT's quarterback was Andy Kelly. Tennessee did lose to Penn State in the Citrus bowl in 1994 with Heath Shuler as quarterback. In his career, Peyton Manning went 3-1 in bowl games. His only loss was to eventual co-champion Nebraska this year.

The second point I want to make is that Peyton Manning did not attend the University of Tennessee for 5 years. Maybe your mistake comes from the fact that Peyton Manning decided to attend the University of Tennessee for one more year despite having completed his undergraduate degree at the end of his third year in college. This is quite a feat in itself and one that I doubt Ryan Leaf will match.

The third point I want to make is Peyton Manning was not "born to choke." Although he never beat some very good Florida teams, he won his share of big games in one of the toughest football conferences in the country (look at his overall record sometime). More importantly, according to his coaches, professors, and Tennessee football fans everywhere, Peyton Manning is a winner in the game of life. I certainly hope that the staff of the Collegian will do a better job in the future of checking facts that are printed in the paper. Although this is only a sports article, I think it reflects the University as a whole when reporters in any subject do not check the facts printed in their articles.

As for the relative merits of Peyton Manning compared to Ryan Leaf, I think they are both can't miss prospects and I leave it to the experts to decide which is better. Of course, the experts said Heath Shuler was a can't miss prospect as well.

Black Affairs logo should go

To the Editor:

I would like to address an issue which has been troubling me for some time now, and it seems appropriate to direct my concerns to Edgar Barros, the editor of the Black Affairs Page.

The clenched fist logo prominently displayed on the page is inappropriate. The Black Affairs Page is meant to address issues which are important to people of color, but if it is not used as a tool to invite those of us who are not black to learn more of black culture and participate in the discourse on issues of particular importance to the black community, the page is less a tool for education, inclusion, growth and change, and more a forum for individual vituperation and demagoguery.

I am a white man who over the years has been blessed with friends, colleagues and acquaintances from more walks of life and cultures than I can remember. We came together with open minds, open hearts and open hands extended in welcome — not a clinched fist.

Consider this: What would be the reaction, and how much would it add to the diversity and understanding between races on this campus if the Collegian, hypothetically speaking, printed a page titled the White Affairs Page with a raised white fist at the top corners? As a white man I would be embarrassed at such audacity. How about an Asian Affairs Page with a yellow fist? Why don't we all just raise our fists and spout off about issues which concern only our race, our particular culture? I can see it now — a glorious sea of diversity in hatred!

I, for one, have no interest in listening to the views of anyone who prefaces their remarks by raising a fist in my face. Barros and the Collegian should do away with it, and adopt a logo more akin to the open hand of welcome and fellowship. If the Black Affairs Page is ever to really serve the black community it must seek to include people of all races in its readership. It must seek to incite discussion, involvement and understanding, all things which are antithetical to that juvenile bit of graphic design.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts, operating solely on revenues generated by advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. The Collegian has been published daily since 1967, and has been a broadsheet publication since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call (413) 545-3500 weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Tracks to enjoy this summer include "What's Going On?"

What's going on? Lately, with the combination of daylight savings time, warm weather, and the fact that I'm a second semester senior, not a lot of what's going on involves school. Since I want to see nothing but love and Kool-Aid smiles on campus, I thought I'd share the joy with my Butterfried Summer Jams, 100 percent natural of course.

D-Lo's Butterfried Summer(and spring) Jams

"I'm Talented" by Master Minds is the first release from these Bronx-city kids. Give them a chance and thank me forever.

"Rap Scholar" by Das EFX also features Redman. I'm not going to say anything about this track other than it's bumping and it will probably be on every mix tape by the end of the month.

Adam Dlugacz

"Dart Throwing" from Cappadonna features Method Man. I think this might be the hottest single here, especially with a southern blues beat in the background. It's perfect for hot days when there's nothing to do other than sit on your stoop and lamp.

"Negro League Baseball" from Natural Resource is hot, especially when the female vocals kick in. It's also an intelligent something we need to be exposed to. Make sure you get this not the newer single cause it's whack.

"Won on Won" by Cocoa Brovaz opens with "Ding, that's the sound of the bell/Oh st, that's all you heard before you fell." How's that for an opening line? This track gets me fired up, and it will get you ready to rage throughout an endless summer night.

I've already said enough about "School's In" by J-Live, so just get it.

"360 (Oh-Yeah)" from the Proppellerheads features De La Soul and there's something about De La Soul and summertime; it's like World Series Rings and Yankees, they just go together. Oh yeah, Proppellerheads lay down some fat beats too.

"Trading Places" by AZ is all about the steel drum that makes this great for barbecues. Maybe AZ did learn something from Nas other than how to make up great fantasy league tracks.

"Change" by Shades of Brooklyn is strictly for hot hazy summer days where everything is just slow. You dig?

"The Militia" by Gang Starr, featuring Big Shug and Freddie the Foxx, is another track that is headed for every mix tape of the summer. Play this at the beginning of the party and you will set it off.

"Say What You Want" by Texas featuring Method Man. I don't know if you would consider this a hip-hop track, and Method Man's rhymes sound like throw-offs, but the female vocalist has soul. When you're driving around, play this and smile.

The next couple of listings are tracks that have come out years ago, so I'm not going to write anything about them because you have probably heard them. Suffice it to say all of these artists are better than you and almost everyone to come after them so just bow now.

"Everyday People" — Sly and the Family Stone

"Ooh Child" — Five Stairsteps

"Pass The Peas" — The JB's

"I've Got Dreams To Remember" — Otis Redding

"Blueberry Hill" — Louis Armstrong

"Laughin and Clownin" — Sam Cooke

"The House That Jack Built" — Aretha Franklin

"What's Going On" — Marvin Gaye

The mix tape this week is Where My Dogz At by Craig-G and P-Nice. This tape is a bit of a tribute to DMX as it features two freestyles by him and the new single "Stop Being Greedy." It also has a triple play combo who form a triangle more offensive then Pippen-Jordan-Harper with DMX, Noriega and Canibus. While the tape may be about DMX, Canibus steals the show with the line "I'll rip your skin off just to get on your nerves."

"Triumph" by Cocoa Brovaz shows that there may be reason to put their new album on the top of your shopping list. Fat Joe and Noriega shine on "Misery Needs Company" and the quintessential Canibus track "Second Round Knockout" is on here too.

While the tape has some good tracks and freestyles, it's got too much stuff on here that is on every other mix tape like "Turn It Up" by Busta Rhymes and "It's Alright."

Adam Dlugacz is a Collegian columnist.

(2-for-3) each contributed a single and an RBI in the third. Leftfielder Aaron Braunstein also went 2-for-3 with a walk.

Fordham would get two runs in both the sixth and seventh innings but it was too little too late.

Dagliere also got hits in the second half of Saturday and on Sunday to tie the Massachusetts record for consecutive hits at 28.

Bill Cooke was the winning pitcher as he tossed his fifth consecutive complete game to improve to 6-1. The junior southpaw fanned four while allowing eight hits.

In the second game, the Rams tried to break out of their spell by knocking in the game's first run in the second inning. But UMass starter Ryan Cameron (4-3) never allowed Fordham another inch as he also went the distance, striking out five while allowing three hits and walking four.

In the fourth frame, the Minutemen went off on a four-run rally as Dagliere connected for a double to drive in Bryan Mazzaferro. Doug Clark drove in Dagliere as he ripped a triple into center field. Gautreau closed the scoring with a two-run homer. Braunstein collected three RBI off of his two hits as well.

"Saturday was an all-around good day for us," coach Mike Stone said. "Both hitting and the pitching came through."

On Sunday, neither teams had trouble offensively, as Fordham attacked first with two runs in the first and three more in the second. The Minutemen retaliated with three runs in the bottom half to keep within striking distance as Gautreau hit the last of his weekend round-trippers. But UMass came up empty until the fourth when it tacked on two more runs to trail, 7-5.

Dagliere continued his hot streak as he punched in two runs on a 5-for-5 day including a double. Wolcott also drove in two runs as he connected for his fourth home run on the year. Shortstop Seth Kaplan tallied an RBI as he went 1-for-3.

In the eighth, Samela lead off with a single as Braunstein doubled to force the Rams in a second-and-third situation. Steve Asadoorian came through as he singled to knock in another run. Skeffington and Dagliere rounded out the inning with two more runs off Fordham errors.

UMass starter Jeff Puleri struggled as he pitched five innings, allowing seven runs off 11 hits. Travis Veracka took over in the sixth, pitching three and one-third innings. Veracka allowing three earned runs off four hits. Barnsby closed out the last two-thirds of the game to earn his first save.

"We struggled and had to battle from behind," Stone said. "Fordham came out swinging but we battled back."

■ softball

a 5-and-a-half hour bus trip across the width of Virginia to reach a one-hour flight from Washington to Bradley International Airport, "hell" was had — and said — by the travelling contingent in the end.

In other offensive matters, sophomore Nikki Faessler went 2-for-2 (2 RBI, 13 on the season) with a home run and triple in the 5-0 win, and senior Kelly Buckley went 4-for-4 (3 RBI, 20 on the season) in the 14-1 rain-delayed nightcap to lead the UMass offense.

The catching duo have lit the plate up the past few games, with Buckley (.328 batting average) and Faessler (.228 batting average) combining for three of the five RBI in last Thursday's sweep of Harvard at Totman Field. What is even more impressive is that since her return to the Minutewoman lineup against Rhode Island on April 11, Buckley has hit at an incredible .480 clip (12-25).

Other offensive leaders for the UMass were junior Mandy Galas (.399 batting average, 16 RBI), who had six hits on the afternoon, and senior co-captain Kim Gutridge (.413 batting average, 36 RBI), who continued her red hot spring with five hits and three RBI.

On the mound, junior Danielle Henderson (17-6, 0.70 ERA) threw a one-hitter in the afternoon opener, while striking out eight batters and walking three against the 17th-ranked offense in the nation. Senior Liz Wagner (4-1, 0.80 ERA) was given plenty of run support in the nightcap, and the lone run she surrendered was of the unearned variety.

In fact, the 14 runs UMass scored was the most for the team since April 6, 1996, when the Minutewomen beat this same Virginia Tech team by a 16-0 score in Blacksburg.

With that said, UMass will now have to face off with a slumping UConn squad (19-17-1), who have lost nine straight games. After losing a doubleheader to North Carolina on April 11, the Huskies dropped three straight to last season's NCAA East Regional participant in Boston College and two games to Notre Dame.

UConn has been platooning three pitchers this spring, with Ann Gunderson (7-8, 2.44 ERA), Megan Biddle (7-4, 2.92 ERA) and Jill Cameron (5-5, 3.61 ERA) proving to be a hitable combination, while allowing a .265 average. As a threesome themselves, Henderson, Wagner and freshman Carrie Jeffries have registered a combined 0.84 ERA, and opponents are now hitting .151 at the plate against them.

Speaking of hitting, two Huskies stand out at the plate, with Erin Layton (.361 batting average, 20 RBI) and Abbie Link (.303 batting average, 30 RBI) leading a group that is averaging .276. In contrast, UMass is now hitting .312 as a team after this weekend's action.

Minutewomen Notes: Senior co-captain Tracy Osier (.405 average) was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week for her 12-22 performance at the plate last week (.545 average and .682 slugging percentage), while also eclipsing her single season record for steals with three in the Harvard doubleheader for a total of 27... Henderson picked up her fourth Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week selection of this season as well, striking out 32 batters in 21 innings of work. Her two shutouts this past week now ties her own single season record of 15.

Pete Gautreau is the A-10 Player of the Week for the second time this season after belting four homers last week. Muchie Dagliere continues to lead the team in batting average, and is currently tied for the UMass single season hitting streak at 28 games. Junior Doug Clark is also swinging a hot bat, even though his 18-game hitting streak was snapped on Sunday. Aaron Braunstein had six hits during a three-game sweep of Fordham over the weekend. Shaun Skeffington and Brian Samela are also hitting over the .300 mark.

The Eagles will enter today's game with an 11-16-1 mark and have a young team heading into action against the Minutemen.

Sophomore Steve Langione leads the team with a .451 mark. Sean McGowan is at .427 and leads the team with 10 homers and 36 RBI. Other offensive threats include catcher Jeff Waldron, outfielder Brendan Levesque, and outfielder Chang Choe, all of whom are over .350 on the season.

The Eagles pitching staff has also struggled this year. Chris Gannon is the ace of the staff, posting a 2-0 mark and 1.59 earned run average in six appearances. Langione is also one of the team's primary pitchers, as he is 2-4 with a 4.21 ERA in six starts. Paul Bibbo and Andy Sullivan also have multiple victories for Boston College on the season.

The last time these two teams met was 1996, when UMass beat the Eagles 6-5 in Chestnut Hill. The two teams have never met in Beanpot play.

Minutemen Notes: UMass has won 16 of 19 since coming back north after their early season Florida trip...The Minutemen lead the all-time series with B.C. 26-13. The first meeting of the schools was way back in 1904... Following today's game, UMass will be back in action tomorrow when they will travel to Portland, Maine to face the University of Maine. Travis Veracka will get the start against the Black Bears... The only other action that the Minutemen have had against Beanpot teams this year was last Thursday's 7-6 come-from-behind win over Northeastern. It took three runs in the top of the ninth inning to put UMass over the top in that one... Looking ahead, the Minutemen have a key three-game series with Rhode Island awaiting them this weekend.

Women's lax squeezed by 'Cuse

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

If a psychiatrist was to evaluate this year's Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, the psychiatrist would diagnose the squad as having dual personalities.

Against Syracuse on Sunday, a different team showed up to play than the one who traveled to Hofstra a half a week before. The Minutewomen who played Hofstra pulled out a hard fought 9-8 victory. But when playing the Orangewomen, a first year program, the group stumbled offensively, and fell 8-6 in a game that wasn't that close.

Sophomore Stephanie Pavlick took matters into her own hands with 24:11 to go in the first half to put UMass on the board for the first time, but Syracuse had already put up two of their own by then, and the visiting New Yorkers never fell behind.

With the referees calling a particularly rigid game, and both defenses playing strong, it was up to the playmakers on the field to win the game. Those Massachusetts playmakers that showed up at the six wins they've had this year, did not arrive on Sunday.

When UMass gunslingers like Laura Korutz and Noelle Gorski, who were kept silent all afternoon, got shots on the goal, Orangewoman standout goaltender Clothilde Ewing stopped them cold.

On the other end, the Minutemen defense stood tough, led by goalie Jen Nardi, midfielder Colleen Wales, and defender Lynne Young, who had a great all-around game. Offensively, though, UMass couldn't punch it in.

"We beat ourselves today," coach Francesca McClellan said. "We were very prepared strategically, the defense knew what we were going to see, and that, I think, we did well with. But after a while, the more turnovers you make, the more you're going to have to run to recover, and that's what hurt us.

"Offensively its not that we didn't play well, but when we got the ball, we kind of panicked," Young said. "Defensively I think we played a good strong game. It was just a matter of double teams and the slides not being there. It was the little things that hurt us."

The little things and Syracuse junior attack Carrie Bolduc, who poured in a hat trick as the only Orangewomen upperclassman.

By the time Korutz and frequent scorer Fay Naber got on the board for UMass, it was too little, too late. Their scores in the final three minutes of the game pulled the score back to 8-6, which was how it ended.

This setback will not be the catalyst for a season-ending letdown though.

"This won't hurt us at all," Young said. "It will only make us stronger. We have four games left and I think we're ready to win all four of them."

UM women's tennis takes 2nd at A-10's

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

This weekend, the UMass women's tennis team accomplished everything they set out to do at the Atlantic 10 tournament.

The Minutewomen topped last year's third place finish, and captured second place, as they fell to Virginia Tech 4-0 in the finals.

The finish was the best by any tennis team at UMass in tournament history.

"We could not have asked for a better finish," Massachusetts tennis coach Judy Dixon said. "The team turned in a terrific effort all weekend, and they have a lot to be proud of."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Sophomore Ola Gerasimova

Coming into the tournament, host Virginia Tech was clearly the favorite, as they came in nationally ranked at No. 35.

UMass, George Washington and Temple figured to fit in the 2 through 4 seeds.

After those squads, the rest of the conference featured teams with weaker programs that hoped to be able to win a match or two against a conference rival.

UMass gained the three seed at the coaches meeting and squared off against sixth seeded Dayton after a first round bye.

The Minutewomen proved to be too much for the Lady Flyers, as they pounded out a 6-1 victory.

The top 5 UMass singles players earned straight set victories, before UMass swept the doubles point.

Ola Gerasimova led the way with a 6-1, 6-2 win over Michele Evans. Marie Christine Caron chipped in at No. 2, by defeating Kristen White 6-0, 6-1.

"The Dayton match was a nice win, as we did not expend too much energy," Dixon said. "We knew we would have our hands full with George Washington later on."

The team also knew they would be entering unchartered territory for the program, if they could topple the Colonials and play for the championship.

"I really wanted this win for the team, especially for our three seniors (Caron, Gerasimova, and Lana Gorodetskaya). They really helped to bring this program to the level we are at and they deserved it."

Not only were they deserving, but triumphant as well. The Minutewomen fought off a rain delay, and some nervous stomachs to upend the Lady Colonials 4-0 in the semifinals.

Gerasimova once again took control in No. 1 singles, gutting out a three setter over Julie Kim 6-4, 4-6, 6-3. Kim had handily defeated Gerasimova at the Cornell Invitational in February.

Caron followed up at No. 2 with a decisive 5-7, 6-3, 6-0 victory over Ghada Skaff. Jackie Braunstein won the only other completed singles match over Sarine Weingarten 6-3, 1-6, 6-3.

UMass took two out of three doubles matches to complete the shutout, leading to a jubilant celebration at center court which included UMass mens players as well.

"It was a great moment for the team," Dixon said. "I knew we would run into a wall with Virginia Tech, but this was a great accomplishment for them no matter what happened the next day."

The Minutewomen played hard in the final, but did not have the firepower to compete with Tech just yet, as the Lady Hokies captured their third straight A-10 title by a 4-0 margin.

The Minutewomen may not have won the title, but they did earn several notable individual accomplishments.

Gerasimova and Caron were both honored with places on the All-tournament teams. Both players won all their matches leading up to the final, and exhibited a tremendous will to win all season.

Coach Dixon picked up the women's Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year, the first coach to accomplish this feat at UMass.

"I was tremendously honored to be given the award," Dixon said. "But this would not be possible if not for the outstanding play of the team. Without their efforts, I would not have won the award, so I thank them for this."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior Marie Christine Caron

UMass will now play two more matches to close out the season. The Minutewomen host Fairfield University this afternoon at the Upper Boyden courts, before hosting Boston University tomorrow at the same site. The BU match will serve as Senior Day to honor the efforts of the three terrific seniors that will graduate in May.

"We must be prepared for these matches," Dixon said. "The team reached a high, but we must continue to compete."

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You can reach farther than usual and accomplish more than expected today — provided you remain in touch with your own true desires.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You can find exactly what you want today, but you must be willing to search in places you might overlook at any other time. Be thorough!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may be feeling somewhat uncomfortable with those who otherwise would be your closest friends. You're undergoing a subtle internal change.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You'll have the power to change things for the better at this time, but you must take care you don't try to take on too much at once.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Close and confidential conversations with a friend can yield some surprising information. A shift of priorities is around the corner.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You'll want to double- check information you receive today to make sure that it is accurate and dependable. Seek original sources if necessary.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Someone may pull you into a situation today which is not your idea of fun. Still, you can acquit yourself well if you focus on the positive.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You can learn a great deal today from someone else who maintains a more old- fashioned attitude about certain things.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You are likely to be introduced to a new way of thinking — and, ultimately, behaving. Your adjustment should be quick and easy.

Baseball remains atop A–10 East

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

It was one way to stomp out the constant nag of the second place team in the Atlantic 10 East. Drill them for three losses in a home series to remain undefeated in the conference and force them into a tie for second place.

Massachusetts	8
Fordham	4

That's exactly what the Massachusetts baseball team did this weekend as they beat Fordham 9-4, 8-1, and 11-10 on Sunday to improve to 21-8, 8-0 A-10 and remain at the top of the A-10 East.

Massachusetts	11

The Minutemen also managed to keep alive their six-game winning streak.

The two-for-one on Saturday began with three blockbuster innings for the UMass offense as it scored all nine runs early, including three in the first inning, to hold on for the win.

Senior rightfielder Pete Gautreau started off the third inning with a two-run blast that set off a five-run romp. Senior Matt Wolcott, sophomore Shaun Skeffington, who went 2-for-4 on the day, and senior second baseman Muchie Dagliere

Men's lax snatch win against Fighting Irish

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

NOTRE DAME, Ind. — Jeff Seals could not have picked a better time to score the first goal of his collegiate career, even if he had scripted the scene himself.

The sophomore midfielder snatched the ball off the faceoff, took it through the Notre Dame defense, and scored the gamewinning goal as the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team defeated the Fighting Irish by a 8–7 score at Mouse Krause Stadium.

Massachusetts	8
Notre Dame	7

"You can't get any better than this," Seals said, adding that he considered his game winner the biggest goal of his career. "Easily."

Seals' tally with 6:55 remaining was the last score of a back and forth second half that found Notre Dame (4-6) erase a 5–2 halftime deficit, and it meant the end of a three-game losing skid for the Minutemen (7–3).

"This means a lot, " senior defenseman Harold Drumm said. "ND is a quality club. This win means everything in terms of boosting our confidence."

Drumm played an integral role in securing the win. After the Irish brought the ball into the UMass box following a timeout in the final minute of the fourth quarter, the Minuteman defense locked up every possible opportunity. When one ND player tried to get rid of the ball, Drumm was there to pick off the pass.

"Harold [Drumm] puts himself in position to do great things against great people," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

Still, Drumm downplayed his interception.

"I was in the right place at the right time," Drumm said. "I just think [the ND player] didn't want to get knocked around by Jamie Doherty again."

Doherty, who stepped up his play against the Irish, and Drumm were part of a defensive unit that stymied the Notre Dame offensive attack in the first half.

"The defense really stepped it up," senior midfielder Mike DelPercio said. "They were like crazed animals out there. Jamie Doherty cleaned up a couple of guy's clocks."

A more complete effort in the first half — and particularly the first quarter — was what Cannella was looking for after a game-opening tentativeness caused early setbacks in the last three games.

"I'm happy with the way the guys came out," Cannella said. "It was a good effort against a good team. Its great to get back in the win column."

Four players combined to boost the Minutemen to a 4–0 lead after the first quarter. Jay Negus tallied the last of the opening period goals by scorching the ND defense on a long carry with :42 left.

The Irish could only break in for two goals in the second quarter, while UMass scored one.

In the second half, Notre Dame found its stride, hitting for two unanswered goals in the first three minutes. With 9:36 remaining in the quarter, Chris Dusseau took a Revere La Nose feed, jumped and shot past UMass goaltender John Kasselakis to tie the game at 5–5.

"You've got to hand it to Notre Dame. They came out and played hard in the second half," DelPercio said.

DelPercio launched a sidearm shot past Irish keeper Alex Cade to give UMass a 6–5 lead before Stedman Oakey tied the game again. The deadlock was again broken by DelPercio, who fired a running shot from the right side past Cade.

Notre Dame's leading scorer, Jimmy Keenan, tied the game with 7:01 left with his first goal on the afternoon to set up Seals' heroics.

"Jeff Seals made a great play," Cannella said. "He took it upon himself and went right in."

Softball returns intact as they trounce Hokies

Unbeknownst to the Massachusetts softball team, the hell they would face this weekend would not be getting to Blacksburg, Va. to face Virginia Tech in an Atlantic 10 matchup. Located in "very" western Virginia — not West Virginia, mind you — it is not the most readily accessible of Div. I university venues.

By the end of Saturday afternoon, it was not even close to Purgatory for the Minutewomen (29–12, 11–1 in A–10). After two consecutive going–away style victories over the Hokies (25–23, 7–7 A–10), 5–0 and 14–1 respectively, all was ready for an easy–like–a–Sunday morning return trip for today's doubleheader against Connecticut (3 p.m.).

But, how things can change, and the only hell UMass had to face this weekend was their trek home.

UMass to face Boston College in Beanpot matchup

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

A three–peat of the Beanpot Championship is what the Massachusetts baseball team is hoping for as they head into the two–day tournament today at 2 p.m. for a first round game with Boston College.

Northeastern will go up against Harvard in the early game, with the winners moving on to the championship game on Thursday afternoon. The losers will square off in the consolation game.

UMass has had recent success since entering the tournament after Boston University dropped its baseball program. The Minutemen won the Beanpot in 1996 and 1997.

One of the biggest highlights in Beanpot and UMass baseball history came last year, when Scott Barnsby tossed a no–hitter in front of her Fenway faithful. The senior right–hander has allowed only four hits in two complete Beanpot appearances, so Massachusetts coach Mike Stone has decided to go with what seems to be working, and Barnsby will get the ball today against the Eagles.

The Torrington, Conn. native was out of action for nearly a month with tendinitis, but pitched three innings of work against Hartford on April 13, and has looked strong in his last two outings. Barnsby went two innings to earn the win over Northeastern last Thursday, and went an inning on Sunday to earn his first save of the year.

However, even though the Minutemen look comfortable playing in Fenway, as evidenced by their recent success there, Stone feels that relaxation will be key against Boston College.

"Anytime you play in Fenway, it's pretty exciting. We just need to calm down and enjoy it," Stone said. "As long as we get good pitching, then we'll be fine."

Offensively, the Minutemen continue to put up monster numbers at the plate. As a team, UMass is hitting well over .300, and are averaging close to double digits a contest.

Water polo wins N.E. Regional

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The No. 5 Massachusetts women's water polo team continued its domination of the East coast, by winning the New England Regional this past weekend in Middletown, Conn.

UMass captured the championship by disposing of three foes they had played previously this season. They first defeated MIT in the first round, 18–0. In the semifinals UMass crushed Wellesley 21–2.

They finished off the weekend with a 19–3 victory over Harvard. The Minutewomen remain undefeated against the Crimson this season as this match marked their third victory in a row.

In the quarterfinal game, the Minutewomen dominated MIT as the defense shined through as it has all season. Peggy Nieves only had to make three saves on her way to posting her fifth shutout of the season.

"Peggy is a big reason why we are able to be so successful," said coach Dan McOsker.

Offensively, the Minutewomen got another balanced performance. Senior captain Barbara Hickey netted four goals to set the pace, while junior Andrea Vazquez came through with three of her own. Claudia Clement, Katie Grogan, Marcie Hupp and Sarah Newell each contributed two goal efforts in the victory.

As they proceeded into the semifinals, Wellesley was not able to provide serious threat to the dominant UMass team.

Grogan and Vazquez both exploded in the Wellesley game. The duo scored four goals en route. Clement chipped in with three goals, while Hupp, Laurie Edwards and Lyndsay Crenshaw all netted three in this offensive splash.

The freshman also helped provide a spark in this game as Newell, Erin Hillier and Katie Mayer each tallied one. They have been an incredible addition to the UMass team, and have been successfully contributing all season.

UMass met Harvard in the final on Sunday. The Minutewomen dominated this game even more so than the previous two matchups.

UMass scored 19, and only gave up three goals, but the story of this game was All–American Grogan. She exploded for nine goals against Harvard. Grogan is having an incredible year, but she seemed to really light up the pool and be even better against Harvard. Adding on to her nine goals against them this weekend, she also netted five in their last meeting.

Vazquez, Clement and Hickey each scored two to help UMass bring home the New England Regional Championship, and also qualify easily for this weekend's Eastern Championships, at the University of Maryland. UMass carries with them a school record sixteen straight victories into this weekends competition.

"Eastern's has been one of our goals all season, and with the team playing as a unit, and executing what we have practiced we will do fine," said McOsker.

"Our offense has really started to come together now that they believe in each other, and that explains our increase in offensive play with each game," said McOsker.

UMass returns to action in this weekends Easterns, where the top three qualifiers head to Los Angeles, Calif., the site of the National Championships on May 8–10.

"Nationals has been the goal all along, but we just can't overlook Eastern's," said McOsker.

Third–team All–American Andrea Vazquez

Jill Fisher is anointed 1st team All–American

The giants in the world of women's gymnastics met in Los Angeles this weekend to find for themselves where exactly they stood among the elite. After four days of performing and even more waiting, freshman Jill Fisher came back home as the first Minutewoman first–team All–American since her mentor Tammy Marshall in 1995.

Fisher's performance on Saturday, a 9.900, put her in a fourth place tie with three other competitors in the event, capping a stellar freshman season. In 11 appearances on the floor, Fisher notched at least a 9.900 in nine of them. Her season average going into the nationals was a 9.933. Georgia's Karin Lichey and UCLA's Stella Umeh won the event with a 9.950, a mark Fisher eclipsed or tied five times this season.

"They deserved everything that they got from winning," said Fisher. "I never watch myself, but when watching them, they were unreal."

Fisher took the floor in the first rotation of the preliminaries on Wednesday, posting a 9.900. She was then forced to sit through 12 rounds of competition to see if her score would be among the top eight, allowing her to advance to the finals on Saturday. Fisher's score placed her sixth.

Sophomore Mandy Mosby also traveled to the gala of stars, placing 65th in the preliminaries on the balance beam with a 9.550.

Both will return to next year's squad to give it another run.

Parliament member leaves — with chair

OTTAWA (AP) — Some politicians fight to keep their seats, others resign from them. Stephan Tremblay picked his up, strode past his stunned colleagues in Parliament, loaded it in a van and drove away.

Tremblay, a 24–year–old bush pilot who serves with the Quebec separatist faction in Parliament, staged a protest Monday unlike any in the history of the House of Commons.

Complaining that other politicians were doing little to bridge the gap between rich and poor, he marched out of the chamber with his chair Monday and drove from Ottawa across Quebec to his district, 120 miles north of Quebec City.

Tremblay was greeted as a hero there yesterday as he displayed the chair at a meeting with constituents. He indicated he would return the chair to Ottawa eventually, but first hoped other lawmakers would agree to speak out on the problem of poverty in Canada. He said his chair is "the symbol of parliamentary power" and belongs to the people.

Bush still considering Presidential run

DALLAS (AP) — Texas Gov. George W. Bush said yesterday he hasn't decided whether he will someday run for president, but for now he's following the advice of his mother, former first lady Barbara Bush.

"She said, 'You stay home and do the job you were elected to, boy,'" Bush told the Newspaper Association of America's annual convention.

He had the luncheon crowd laughing with references to his parents, who were guests at a convention banquet the previous evening.

"I've learned lots, but I've learned one thing more than anything else. You can't escape your mother."

Bush said his current campaign for re–election is occupying all his attention.

"No governor has ever been elected to back–to–back four–year terms in our state's history. I intend to be the first," Bush said. "The truth is this: I don't know when and if I'll run for the presidency. I won't know for quite a while."

Bush's performance as governor has attracted national attention. Polls on the 2000 presidential race have shown he may be the Republican candidate to beat.

But Bush fears presidential talk could hurt his re–election chances.

"The only poll I care about is the one here in 1998," said Bush, who is widely favored over Democratic challenger Garry Mauro, the state's land commissioner.

Alumnus rewarded for achievements in corporate world

ALEXANDER KOROMILAS / COLLEGIAN

Robert Meers, a member of the UMass class of 1966, in Memorial Hall yesterday afternoon.

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Robert Meers, Chief Executive Officer President of Reebok, was awarded with the distinguished Eleanor Bateman Scholar in Residence award yesterday afternoon at Memorial Hall for his accomplishments and determination to succeed in the corporate world.

Meers earned his degree as a hotel, restaurant and travel administration at the University of Massachusetts, while also becoming a recognized and honored Minutemen football player, setting one of the past UMass football records of 39 career receptions as a tight end.

As an enthusiastic and talented player, he went on to play semi–pro football in hopes of earning a position in the National Football League. However, a serious injury prevented Meers from reaching his dream of becoming a star athlete. Still, this didn't bring him down, for Meers entered into the business management field. With determination and success, Meers eventually earned the position as CFO and President of Reebok brands.

As Chancellor David K. Scott stated, "the purpose of the award is to promote interaction between students and distinguished alumni. In hopes of applying all fields of expertise that apply to the scholar to the success of the University and its students."

In addressing the audience gathered at Memorial Hall, Meers spoke about how his past and current success as president of Reebok built upon what the University taught him. Since Meers became president of the corporate business, shoe sales have risen by a factor of five.

What was the central key to his success in rising to become president of one of the largest shoe corporations in the nation?

Meers spoke to the UMass campus on his embracing the idea of "Reinventions," the title of his speech. He defined success as those individuals and organizations that seek "change" in order to improve the way of life, and are not too focused on doing what they're good at.

"The most successful individuals are those young and energetic people that have adopted risk and reinvention, instead of those experts seeking to narrow down on a specific field," Meers said.

Meers went on to explain how with determination, hunger for challenges and a willingness to adjust principles (reinventing new ideas), that anyone can be successful and avoid the bitterness and frugality of the corporate world.

"I would invite Allen Iverson to my doorstep everyday," Meers said. "Here is a kid who has reinvented his attitude and playing style amidst all

Second SGA election to follow constitution

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

New elections for the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) will be run by the letter of the constitution in order to prevent the kind of mistakes that nullified the original elections.

"We will be following, literally, the letter of the constitution. [For example] there will be at least two people working at every polling station," said Seth Presser, Chancellor of Elections.

The acting SGA president and executive cabinet will work to ensure the elections on April 29 and 30 run smoothly.

"The purpose in life for the president and cabinet is making sure these elections run smoothly," said Peter Kilbourne, acting SGA president.

"The purpose in life for the president and cabinet is making sure these elections run smoothly," Peter Kilbourne, acting SGA president.

Only candidates who ran in the last elections can run in the new elections.

Daniel Parker, Amy Pellegrino and Salwa Shamapande will be running for SGA president.

Shamapande is running again because he feels he lost unfairly in the last elections.

"A lot of things went wrong so I don't feel I lost fairly," Shamapande said.

Parker said he is also running again.

"Erik [Hansen] and I feel we have a chance to win. We got screwed in the last elections," Parker said.

Pellegrino could not be reached for comment.

Eleanor Court, Jeffrey Howe and Erik Hansen will be running for student trustee.

Howe said he and Pellegrino will be running again.

"Amy and I are definitely running again," Howe said in an earlier interview.

Court feels she is the most qualified candidate.

"I still feel I'm the most qualified person for the position especially regarding the alcohol policy," Court said.

Hansen could not be reached for comment.

Several individuals will not be running again.

"Brenda Fitzpatrick, Jesse Burchfield and Eric Magazu have informed me they are not running. Evan Pozantes has informed me of his intention to withdraw," Presser said.

Phillip Blue and Brian Tirrell will not be running in the new elections.

Jennifer Casasanto could not be reached for comment.

Area Government positions will also be decided in the new elections.

"Whenever the polls are open you will be able to vote for area government positions," Presser said.

Candidates will be given more credit rather than Purchase Orders to buy campaign supplies. Candidates cannot use their own money to campaign.

"They will have a $75 credit at Copy Cat and a $100 credit at Staples," Presser said.

There will be a debate with the candidates April 27 at 7 p.m. in the Colonial Lounge in the Student Union.

SGA to hold open house

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

To give students a firsthand look at the inner workings of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) there will be an open house today from 5–7 p.m. in the SGA office, room 420 in the Student Union.

"Right now the student body has been reading a lot about the SGA, so we want to have students meet the officers and let them know we are working," said Peter Kilbourne, acting president. "We'll meet people and show them around."

Kilbourne feels the open house will give students a chance to talk with SGA members about issues that concern them.

"It's open to all students," Kilbourne said. "There are a lot of new issues, especially concerning alcohol, that need to be addressed."

Kilbourne hopes the open house will also benefit Registered Student Organizations (RSOs).

"I hope we have a lot of RSOs here to let them know we have facilities they can use like scanners, copiers and computers. We are actually here for them, contrary to popular belief," Kilbourne said.

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

As part of Holocaust Memorial Week at the University of Massachusetts, author Louise Kehoe will present a discussion entitled "Hide and Seek: Reclaiming Jewish Identity After the Holocaust" at the Hillel House at 7 p.m. tonight. The discussion is the fourth in the Hillel series, "Making Choices on Loving, Living and Dying."

Kehoe received the 1995 National Jewish Book Award for In This Dark House, a memoir of her family. The book chronicles Kehoe's personal search for her Jewish identity after discovering that her father had hid his own Jewish identity from his family. Kehoe learned that her paternal grandparents, whom her father had left in Poland, had been taken to the Warsaw ghetto and later to concentration camps where they were killed.

The death of his parents during the Holocaust influenced Kehoe's father's decision to hide his Jewish heritage from his children. Kehoe recognized the importance of the Holocaust in the lives of Jewish people in an article which ran in The New York Times entitled "What Being Jewish Means to Me" as part of a series by The American Jewish Committee.

Mill River Watershed Project to be held tomorrow

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Staff

In collaboration with a number of other conservation organizations, the University of Massachusetts Extension will launch the Mill River Watershed Project tomorrow.

The event will take place at Frontier Regional High School in Deerfield as part of Earth Day.

The Watershed Initiative is a conservation program concerned with protecting the water resources of the Mill River watershed. Four towns which make up the watershed will be involved in this event: Hatfield, Whately, Deerfield and Conway. They will be included in the presentation with a driving tour of the area.

These four towns contain integral farm and forest resources. Mill River and its tributaries provide drinking water by feeding reservoirs in Whately and Deerfield, which contribute to the public drinking supply.

Students from Frontier Regional High School will have an opportunity to get involved with the program. UMass Extension project coordinator Scott Jackson said. He mentioned some of the activities the event will include.

"We will be stocking salmon at Westbrook, which is in Whately; conducting water quality monitors and shoreline surveys. A graduate student will be working with the students, helping them to understand watershed processes," Jackson said.

Clinton takes aim at Joe Camel and cigarette industry defenders

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — With Democratic congressional leaders at his side, President Clinton attacked d'fenders of the Joe Camel cigarette ads and made a pitch for Congress to follow his lead on tobacco and education legislation.

Clinton renewed his call for the election-year Congress to act soon on bills to reduce teen smoking, as part of a comprehensive tobacco settlement, and to put more money into repairing and modernizing public schools.

Appearing in the White House Rose Garden yesterday after meeting with Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota and House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt of Missouri, the president took aim at the Joe Camel character, which he said was designed to "hook our children early to the deadly habit of smoking."

"Even as the [industry] executives denied they were targeting children, Joe Camel became as recognizable to them as Mickey Mouse," Clinton said.

"Now, some in Congress say that teen smoking has nothing to do with Joe Camel. Medical science and common sense makes it plain: Teen smoking has everything to do with Joe Camel — with unscrupulous marketing campaigns that prey on the insecurities and dreams of our children."

Daschle was more pointed in his criticism, saying House Speaker Newt Gingrich is "hinting he's more on Joe Camel's side" than on the side of those who want to enact measures — such as new restrictions on advertising — to discourage teen smoking.

Gingrich fired back, saying the Clinton administration is on the wrong track.

"We're prepared to focus on stopping kids from smoking," Gingrich said. "Now, does the president want to stop kids from smoking, or does he want a smoke screen behind which he gets higher taxes, bigger bureaucracy and bigger government?"

Later, White House aides kept up the attack. Referring to House Republican leaders, press secretary Mike McCurry said, "They're in a world of hurt up there, and you can tell it today because they have elected to side with the tobacco industry."

McCurry emphasized the administration thinks House Republicans are vulnerable to public pressure on the Film shows what You Don't Know

By Dylan Larke
Collegian Staff

Tonight a documentary screening of You Don't Know Dick: Courageous Hearts of Transsexual Men will be shown in 102 Thompson Hall at 7 p.m.

Mykael Hawley from the International Foundation for Gender Education will introduce the documentary. Following the film, a panel of four transmen who will speak about their lives and answer audience members' questions.

The documentary is based on the interviews of six transmen, their partners, friends and family members.

"Documentarists will discuss how they came to be men, if there are really differences between men and women, and reactions from their parents, friends, partners and children," sociologist and Free Boyz founder Saul Accetta said.

The interviewees have allowed their real first names to be used in the documentary.

Ted, an automotive technician and the first transman introduced in the film, will discuss how he just wants a "life of a normal man."

"I don't think it is a coincidence that it wasn't until I began to take myself seriously as a man that I was able to take myself seriously as an artist as well," painter and film participant Michael said.

Next to be introduced is James, a writer and Director of Female-to-Male (FtM) International, who works as an activist on behalf of transsexual men.

San Francisco police lieutenant Stephan will follow James' documentary. Stephan will discuss how a few years ago he had an "epiphany [while being intimate with his lover] and began just weeping... in grief over not being a man."

Loren, the last transman to be introduced, is a photographer who published a book in 1997, Body Alchemy, which features FtM transgendered and transsexual people.

"The showing of this documentary will really allow people to learn more about the experience of transsexual men in mainstream U.S. society," Accetta said. "This is the first time a documentary of only FtM's has been made."

This event is being sponsored by the Stonewall Center; University of Massachusetts Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender (GLBT) resource center, Pride Alliance; UMass GLBT undergraduate group, International Foundation for Gender Education; and Free Boyz, a non-female gender conforming Northampton social group.

A $3 donation will be requested.

tobacco issue this election year.

"They're going to find that's a very uncomfortable position to be in," McCurry said. "And we intend to raise the cost of them being in that position, as you saw today."

A spokesman for the tobacco industry, Scott Williams, said Clinton's focus on Joe Camel was an example of using "the rhetoric of the industry's past." He said Joe Camel has not been used in advertising for more than a year.

Clinton, in his Rose Garden remarks, was careful to praise Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) whose anti-tobacco bill the White House favors but Gingrich calls too liberal.

Later, Senate GOP leaders told reporters they favor Gingrich's approach: a more narrow tobacco bill aimed at reducing teen smoking and drug use rather than a comprehensive measure that would include expanding federal regulatory powers on tobacco.

Still, White House officials held out hope for a bipartisan bill that includes a multibillion-dollar settlement with the tobacco industry and other provisions.

Bruce Reed, the president's domestic policy adviser, told reporters: "We think things are going well. We are within striking distance." He spoke after attending a meeting between McCain and Erskine Bowles, the president's chief of staff.

Even while he attacked Republicans on tobacco, Clinton acknowledged that he was wrong to be seen with a cigar in his mouth, as happened on his recent Africa trip. A reporter asked him about Gingrich's comment Monday that Clinton was sending the "wrong signal to youngsters by smoking cigars on celebratory occasions."

Kilbourne wants the open house to give the SGA legitimacy in the eyes of the administration.

"We are inviting the student office side of the administration. Right now the legitimacy with the administration is low. It would be a good thing for the cabinet to meet them," Kilbourne said.

In addition to seeing the SGA office and meeting the executive cabinet, students will be encouraged to attend the SGA meeting that starts after the open house.

"Our goal is to hopefully have people interested in the SGA come to the meeting," Kilbourne said.

The SGA meeting will be at 7 p.m. in room 168 of the Campus Center.

Kilbourne feels the open house will show the SGA is working for students.

"The SGA is a body who's really out to serve the students," Kilbourne said.

"The Holocaust has always loomed large in my consciousness," Kehoe said. "For what happens to one Jew happens to all, and It is this very feeling of connectedness, of shared history and common experience, which makes being Jewish such a precious gift."

At 40, Kehoe began the process of reclaiming her identity by studying with a rabbi, learning basic Hebrew, studying Torah and attending synagogue services. The first part of her journey culminated with her formal conversion to Judaism.

Tonight, along with a slide show, Kehoe will present a lecture after which there will be time for questions and discussion.

Kehoe will also be speaking today at 1 p.m. in Herter 222 on conversion to Judaism for an open session of the course Jewish Christian Encounter. She will also join students for dinner at 5 p.m. in the Hillel House at the Kosher Dining Commons.

Other Holocaust Memorial Week activities included last night's showing of the movie Swing Kids at the Hillel House. Tomorrow's presentation by UMass professor of English and Judaic Studies James Young entitled "Portrayals of the Holocaust" will be followed by the movie A Return to Auschwitz at the Hillel House. The presentation will start at 5 p.m. and the movie will start at 7 p.m. A campus-wide Holocaust memorial service will be held tomorrow at the campus pond at 6:30 p.m.

the media's attempts to drown him in allegations, and I truly admire him for his determination."

Meers went on to explain how his success has also been built upon by Reebok's decision to test its products through the world-wide web. This has further helped to enhance technology and success by adapting the needs of the consumers that are testing the products' ability to suit their needs.

While other companies have focused on adapting their athletic products for fashion purposes or even entertainment needs, Reebok has focused, with Meers' influence, on performance and then fashion. By embracing the idea of "reinventions," Meers has become successful and has become a model for all to aspire to as the Bateman Scholar.

In a few years, Meers will be leaving Reebok to yet take on another challenge and to face the insecurity of his "reinventions" that have taken him to the top of success.

Officials tried to warn 727 pilot just before fatal Colombian crash

By Paul Haven
Associated Press

BOGOTA, Colombia — Air traffic controllers warned a Boeing 727 that it was off course moments before the jet slammed into Bogota's eastern mountain range, killing all 53 people aboard, an aviation official said yesterday.

The pilot acknowledged the warning, but did not report any emergency before Monday's crash, said Col. Julio Alberto Gonzalez, deputy director of the civil aviation authority.

A five-hour pre-dawn search of the Air France Flight 422 crash site today by 15 rescuers with 10 dogs yielded no signs of life, and investigators climbed the ridge after daybreak to begin a meticulous search.

Amid smoldering flesh and chunks of twisted steel strewn across a half-mile of mountainside just above the capital, rescue workers and police had worked through rain and waning light to recover bodies from the crash.

The 727-200, leased by an Ecuadorean company and flown by an Ecuadorean crew, had just taken off for the Ecuadorean capital, Quito, when it failed to make a sharp turn south and plowed into the fog-shrouded peak. It was raining lightly at the time of the crash.

Most of those aboard were Ecuadorean. Victims also included a Briton, a Swede, a Honduran, two Colombians, four Danes, six French citizens and six Italians, two of them on their honeymoon. Thirty-nine passengers had started their trip in Paris, changing planes in Bogota.

On Monday, ambulances and police cars with red-and-blue emergency lights whirring navigated up a narrow dirt path, turned to mud by a late afternoon rain. Hundreds of rescue workers, wearing rubber gloves and with handkerchiefs covering their mouths, fished identity cards, passports, credit cards and even a postcard of the Eiffel Tower from the debris.

They had to contend with hundreds of curious onlookers who climbed the ridge that rises 1,600 feet above Bogota. At least two people were arrested for looting.

"There's nothing left, nothing," said Sergio Rodriguez, a 15-year-old who lives near the crash site. "I ran when I saw the plane crash, but there's nobody (alive)."

Rescue workers who found three pairs of teddy bear-patterned infant pajamas searched for a baby, but to no avail. Other debris floated from the tops of eucalyptus trees in the damp, cold breeze of the waning daylight.

After finding just five intact bodies, authorities called off the search at dusk Monday, when drizzle turned to downpour, extinguishing the last flames of the wreckage. They had no hope of finding survivors.

"There are hands, feet and legs. Most of what we have recovered are very small body parts," said a police officer at the scene, Fernando Molino. Some bodies were so maimed that the only indication of a victim's sex were painted fingernails.

Marco Emilio Erazo, a spokesman for TAME, the Ecuadorean airline that leased the plane to Air France, said the pilots were retired members of the Ecuadorean air force and that the plane was not old. The airline planned to fly in victims' relatives from Quito. French Prime Minister Lionel Iospin said in Paris that a team of French investigators was sent to Bogota to help investigate the accident.

The jet crashed about 150 feet below the mountain's summit in daylight — at 4:47 p.m. — three minutes after takeoff, said civil aviation spokesman Martin Gonzalez.

A controller said the plane was supposed to turn 90 degrees to the right after takeoff, but didn't. The cockpit did not report any problems with the jet. Police located the plane's flight recorder and took it down the 10,170-foot mountain in a police jeep. Dionisio Sosa, an air traffic controller at El Dorado airport, said the plane was cleared for a departure pattern known as "Girardot One." Planes following that pattern initially fly straight after leaving the runway, then pass over a radio navigation beacon called "Romeo" located 2,000 feet from the runway's end and turn about 90 degrees to the right to continue on their way.

UM chair criticizes treasurer

BOSTON (AP) — The board chairman of the University of Massachusetts said he hopes its 200,000 alumni in the state are as offended as he is by Joseph D. Malone's attacks on UMass President William M. Bulger.

Malone, who is state treasurer and is seeking the Republican nomination for governor, has said he would try to remove Bulger from the post if elected governor.

Malone, in radio advertisements and at the Republican State Convention last weekend, used Bulger's name as a symbol of "the old way of doing things."

Convention delegates responded enthusiastically to that, but less so to Malone, who was endorsed by only 29 percent of them, compared with 71 percent who endorsed acting Gov. Paul Cellucci.

"I am deeply offended by Joe Malone's cynical and manipulative attacks on the University of Massachusetts, and hope the university's 200,000 alumni living and working in Massachusetts will be equally offended," Robert S. Karam, chairman of the UMass board, said Monday.

"As Joe Malone approaches his political Armageddon, he is engaging in a sad, pathetic effort to direct attention away from his failed campaign," Karam said.

"Joe Malone has no ideas, no support and no hope. He just can't accept the truth," Karam continued.

Karam also said Malone had "amassed a shameful record" as state treasurer, and had turned the office into a "patronage mill."

Karam is a Democrat from Fall River. He originally was appointed to the University board by then-Gov Michael S. Dukakis, also a Democrat.

Bulger, a Democrat, served as president of the state Senate before he was named to the University post in 1996. He had been accused of cronyism, and of tightly controlling the Senate. Malone criticized Bulger for moving the University president's office to prime space in downtown Boston, including a $1 million-a-year lease.

Karam said Malone distorted the lease arrangement, calling it a "fiscally responsible decision" that consolidated the president's office and other University offices.

and UMass will provide assessments of the environmental health of the Mill River and its tributaries, water quality, fish and wildlife habitat.

Land use and its potential to impact water resources will be assessed by the Franklin Regional Council of Governments with assistance from the UMass.

The Natural Resources Conservation Service and Silvio O. Conte National Fish and Wildlife Refuge will be available to provide technical assistance and have incentive programs that can be used to fund practices that improve water quality and wildlife habitat.

"The goal of the Mill River Watershed Project is to make science, research and planning resources available to local officials and their communities and to develop a coordinated approach to resource protection across town boundaries," a press release said.

The project is coordinated by UMass Extension with funding provided by the Silvio O. Conte National Fish and Wildlife Refuge and the Massachusetts Watershed Initiative.

Pack rat mentality

As a graduating senior, I have many concerns on my mind. But the other day, as I was contemplating the high school reunion on "90210," I realized what my most gigantic problem was. In fact, for the first time, the problems faced by Brandon and company on "90210" paled compared to my latest woe.

Seema Gangatirkar

See, I'm not terribly concerned over the fact that I'm still unemployed, have $4.37 in my savings account, spend 74.8 percent of my free time at the Collegian and have no idea where I'm going once May 24 rolls around. Things like this should concern me, but right now those problems have turned into a sort of calm hysteria now that I'm becoming more overwhelmed than ever by the sheer amount of junk I own.

Right now, the stuff in the my room has me up at nights, trying to figure how I'm going to move all this stuff out of here.

Y'all know there isn't much space in dorm rooms, but over the last four years I've managed to pass Cramming 101 with flying colors (along with some help from my equally materially blessed roommate). And now, as I take serious inventory of my life's possessions, I'm overwhelmed. "What do I have this?"

I've analyzed the situation and discovered the root of my problem is simple: I can't throw anything away. Let me just tell you about some things I've got knocking around my room.

Smoke detector — Not the University–installed one, but my own $6 K–Mart special. This is a relic from the over-anxious parents' era, when two smoke alarms were simply not enough, so now I've got one of my own. I feel safer knowing that my smoke alarm is positioned strategically under my bed.

Novels of literary merit — I'm not talking academic books, but rather those great works penned by some long– dead genius. Current residents of my bookshelf include Victor Hugo and Charles Dickens. The unabridged, hardcover editions of Les Miserables (900–something pages) and David Copperfield (800–something pages) look really great and I'm sure the stories are wonderful, but darn, these two novels make super paperweights.

Television antenna — Thanks to cable (even Housing Services Cable) antennas are a thing of the past, which doesn't explain why I have one of these.

Pots — I don't cook. In fact, I've just barely mastered cooking with water. But somehow, I have felt the need to collect about 10 different pots in various sizes and shapes, just in case I feel the need to cook. I'm still waiting.

The joys of modern appliances — Along with the pots, I own a variety of appliances that would make Martha Stewart green with envy. Along with my illegal kettle and toaster oven, I also have a rice cooker, crock pot and sandwich maker. Conceivably, I could whip up a feast right in the comfort of my room — if I cooked.

Random bits of paper — Years ago I invested in this multi-colored pad of paper because I thought it would look cute and would help bring some order to my chaotic life. Well, chaos reigns supreme as little scraps of yellow, green and pink paper litter my desk. Most contain phone numbers without names, e-mail addresses and random "Notes to Self." I'd love to throw some of these messages away, but I feel like if I did, I would immediately regret it.

At this point, it would take Mayflower in conjunction with UPS to get me out of my dorm and I have a sinking feeling that the parents simply aren't up to the task.

Add to that my phobia of throwing anything, however insignificant, away and you can tell what a tortured existence I'm living as everyday the amount of stuff in my room multiplies out of control. My current state of senioritis indicates the easiest possible solution must be found.

I don't suppose Chancellor Scott would want eight beach towels and a cracked flower vase.

Highway patrol

It was a dark and lonely night in the tower library. I was sitting on the new blue chairs in an utterly awkward position — three textbooks open on my legs and notebooks stuffed in around the sides of the chair — when I felt that sensation in the pit of my stomach. There was only one solution: Twinkies.

Alexis Pushkar

I couldn't concentrate on my work, and there was nothing else in the universe except two golden hot dogs. I heaved myself up out of the chair, papers spilling everywhere. Five minutes later, I was striding through the warm night on a mission.

But alas, Twinkies aren't sold on the University of Massachusetts campus. Not in a vending machine. Not in the coffee shop. Not In the Blue Wall. Not in Franklin Munchie store.

In short, I wandered through campus a nervous and miserable shell of a person. I stared into the void of the night and wondered about life on another college campus. I wondered how my friends were and if Twinkies were easily at their disposal.

As much as I like UMass, in the springtime I'm just aching to hit the road with a few good tapes and chase the edge of the sky.

"I should go and visit my friend in New Jersey!" I thought. New Jersey license plates are yellow like Twinkies, so I had high hopes for my journey.

What is it about the spring that generates wanderlust? As soon as the days become ever so slightly warmer and longer, I want to drive off somewhere to see something and do something new and different. As much as I like UMass, in the springtime I'm just aching to hit the road with a few good tapes and chase the edge of the sky.

Every other person I talk to seems to feel the same way. If I had a Twinkie for every time someone has said something to me about a weekend road trip, I could audition for the role of the mother in "What's Eating Gilbert Grape: The Sequel."

So I rolled out of bed last Saturday morning and hit the road, my father's reproaches and predictions of doom echoing in my head.

I had never been to New Jersey; I had never been on such a long road trip by myself. I had never seen my friend at her school with all her friends. In fact, I hadn't seen my friend since December. Did she even eat Twinkies? I wondered. Hmmm, the weekend could be full of surprises and discoveries.

I did discover many things along the way. There are 90 million McDonalds restaurants between here and Princeton, and none of them sell Twinkies. I also discovered that key lime yogurt is hard to eat while driving because it tends to fall off the spoon and gravitate toward unmentionable areas of my jeans. Finally, I discovered that the New Jersey state number is 35 because I had to stop every other mile on the Garden State Parkway to pay a 35 cent toll. And phone calls are 35 cents, too.

Thus, I arrived, broke and disheveled, my appetite for Twinkies whetted by the yellow license plates I saw along the New Jersey Turnpike and Route 1. Alas, I discovered no Twinkies in Princeton, but I did discover enormous quantities of free alcohol for anyone over or under the age of 21. Suddenly, the two cream–filled golden cakes were a distant memory.

I had set out on Saturday with wanderlust coursing through my veins and asphalt ribbons pulling at my tire treads. I had set out to see an old friend. I had set out to see a new place. I had set out to have an adventure. I had set out to find cheap chemical junk food.

I found most of what I was looking for and some of what I never expected. While I was driving home I thought of one of my favorite quotes, an African saying: "Somewhere the sky touches the Earth and the name of that place is the end."

The destination of the journey isn't quite the point as much as the thrill of the trip is. For three days I was free to travel and do whatever I wanted, but if I had found the Twinkies I would have been too contented and I never would have come home. I didn't want to reach the end; I just wanted to chase the horizon for awhile.

I still haven't found any Twinkies. I should probably just go to Dairymart. But I think it would be more fun to climb into my car and buy them somewhere else. Virginia? Colorado? Florida? I'll hit the road next weekend and let you know.

Balance and timing

The sprawling springtime at our University is a time for ritualistic celebration. Just as the migratory birds and butterflies carry them north, just as colors return to the trees, we students go through the same thing every year: pre– registration, finals, summer break, etc. Oh, that's a minute, some of us, myself included, are graduating.

I have been told I have an active imagination, but I can't for the life of me imagine what life will be like once I leave UMass. Until very recently, I was perfectly fine with the concept of getting my diploma and moving on in the world.

Yet comments like "less than six weeks to go," have made this abstract concept much more real, and much more frightening. The idea that next year I won't be studying anymore, and I will have to travel several hours to see people who lived five minutes away, is quite overwhelming. My fear isn't so much connected to job hunting and what I will do with myself, although that aspect is part of it. I think, like many, I'm afraid of change, and how at times like this, time with a capital "T," passes more rapidly than we would like.

I'll never understand how the seconds, and minutes of a day which can be measured can feel so subjective.

After all, it's never during those long hours of studying or that tough exam that I'm like "Damn, stuff is happening too fast." Maybe a physics major could explain how time never seems constant and always seems relative. I'll never understand how the seconds, and minutes of a day which can be measured can feel so subjective. Like a four–hour tennis match that is decided by a few key points, everyday life sometimes feels like a set build up those defining moments.

Something tells me these last few weeks before graduation will be filled with defining moments, marking the end of something significant. Some have had the reverse reaction, but to me that exam next week or that 15–page term paper doesn't seem quite as important. Instead, I'm thinking about people and the reality that very soon I won't be seeing them every day. Every time a large group of my friends get together someone invariably says, "Wow, this could be the last time we're all in a group like this."

What seems urgent is that I spend as much time as possible with those who have enriched my life. Climbing that mountain I have never climbed, trying that new restaurant, all seem more important than everything academic. I'm not saying that graduating seniors should blow off their remaining work, nor am I suggesting that we regret the times we opted to study instead of venturing out.

Bryan Schwartzman

What I am saying is that we should resist the temptation to view these last few weeks as sad occasions. Instead they should be times to celebrate, celebrate both the times with our friends and whatever balance we have struck between our academic responsibilities and our social lives. A coach of mine once told me that balance was the key to a successful life. I think he was missing one important element, though: timing. I hope I haven't found balance too late.

I'm waging a war within myself to get rid of the nice–girl syndrome my mother has passed down to me.

Remember the last presidential election, two weeks after Bob Dole lost the election he was cracking jokes on television commercials. Many people said if Dole had been as relaxed and personable during the campaign as he was after, they would have considered voting for him. Just before they lose, tennis players often open up and reel off several great shots. Why? Because they have nothing to lose. The challenge with college, and the world beyond college, is reacting with intensity and serenity when it does matter.

The rhythms of this world are difficult to figure out, they ebb and flow like the tides of a river. These rapids are almost over, and it's been a great ride!

Dirty secrets of the NCAA have to tell to you about the hookers, drugs and 4x4s.

I'm a senior now and I'm starting to feel some genuine guilt about our weekend activities — even our plush lives in general — as NCAA athletes. Not the sort of guilt that makes people tell the truth to a committee — God, no. I'm talking about the burning we all have when you've kept a brilliantly dirty secret for a long time.

Come a little closer, friends.

C.Taylor Conner

If the majority of the student body had even the slightest concept of the various perks and violations in which we revel during the average day, they might char us loan of Arc–style, stoking us with media guides.

First and foremost, don't fool yourself into believing the first half of the designation student—athlete. By the time most of us are high school sophomores (or eighth–graders if you play a non–racquet sport involving a ball) we don't see the ivory leaves of a book ever again. Rather, Shady Joe takes care of it.

Don't worry about it, he says.

Another common myth is that we must actually take our SATs. Nonsense. Then why do some superstars manage to flop the entrance exams, you might ask? It's simple. They forget to mail in their NCAA Decett forms (which, naturally, "don't exist") and before they know it — BANG — they're forced to waste 20–30 minutes of their athletic day doodling "69" in bubble–test art.

But Shady Joe always takes care of it. Don't worry about it.

The real fun, of course, commences with your enrollment in the college of your choice. Once Shady Joe has selected all of your classes and a suitable body double to attend them in your place, you can concentrate on the important things.

You know what they are — what we like to call "Tarkania."

Tarkania is quite obviously named for former UNLV basketball coach Jerry Tarkanian, who threw just a NCAA rule he wouldn't moon with cheeks spread — and then subsequently deny having dropped his pants. Tarkania is, in lay terms, the gooooooood stuff.

I don't know about other teams, but on road trips our boys and girls are particularly fond of streetwalkers. But since our budget is sadly limited, we usually have to import them from a smaller city like Springfield or Worcester.

But Shady Joe always says, Hey, them Boston tramps and hustlers is overrated. Don't worry about it.

Point shaving, while simple in most other sports, is an aspect of Tarkania which is pretty tough to get away with when it comes to track. I mean, how many dives can a 10,000 meter stud take 50 feet before the finish line. For Christ's sake, the guy's just run 9,900 meters and he goes down? Who'll buy that?

But Shady Joe always says, Look, these distance types, yous gotta understand they like the drama. They even dig pooping their shorts in marathons. Don't worry about it.

Yet sometimes situations do get a little sticky. For every upstanding spoiled, insolent jock–child, there has to be a bad seed in the lot. The kid who shoots up too much free training room Ibuprofen between his toes and flips. The nimrod who shows up to a discussion session. The silly who wears the gold necklace his agent gave him on television.

Somebody inevitably screws it all up for the rest of our pampered elite. Maybe you folks reading this think it's easy to conceal hundreds of free Ford Explorers and Expeditions when the NCAA "cops" hit campus. Can you imagine how quickly you have to prep any number of coaches and athletes to deny everything with conviction?

For Shady Joe, it's a real hassle, but he always takes care of it. Don't worry about it.

I have to say, though, if I had to do it all over again, I'd definitely take greater advantage of the opportunities presented to me. That extra $500 on that bender in the Montreal strip club would have come in so handy, but I guess that pang of guilt I had about the three grand I'd dropped already just ate me up.

And in retrospect, maybe I should have accepted that Armani from that booster even though I generally prefer double–breasted suits. It would have been right thing to do, a polite concession.

Perhaps you're on the horn with "Directory Assistance" right at this instant, your eyes crimson and green with fury and jealousy, respectively, as you demand to be put in touch with the NCAA. Don't bother — they're all busy at big, big name schools like Nebraska and Arizona State, waiting for those babies to flash that ominously obtained candy once more. And it should go without saying they're barking up Tark's tree at Fresno State.

But here at UMass, we're just big enough to flaunt the goods, yet just small enough not to worry.

God bless Shady Joe.

The way of the swoosh

Nike is more than a company — it's an institution, a way of life. Maybe once the swoosh was associated with shoes, but now that's way too prosaic a connection. Nike used to sell footwear, but now they sell ideals: the lifestyle of the swoosh is sold in the form of various t–shirts, sweatshirts, and posters. This assorted paraphernalia now accounts for a greater share of Nike sales than all their shoes together. And this definitely seems to be an inspiring trend. If you see the ads, you'll see that Nike has a truly relevant message — one of racial and gender equality, personal empowerment, identity and ability. The revolution comes as this message is then distilled into a single swoosh, a stand– alone icon which represents the entire Nike Way. More significant is that we all buy it: both the ideals and the products. We buy it so much that Phil Knight, Nike's CEO, is America's sixth richest man, worth over $5 billion. We buy it so much that the swoosh is one of the world's most recognized icons: Nike no longer uses its own name in much of its advertisements, nor does it need to.

John Zerolnick

The troubling question, then, is: Why are more and more people turning away from Nike? What is it about the glorious swoosh that strikes many as disingenuous, hypocritical, downright malicious? Why do Nike's ads (ads which the company spends nearly $1 billion on each year!) seem to be hiding something shameful? The answer has something to do with last Saturday. April 18 marked the second annual International Day of Action Against Nike. That day saw protests against the swoosh around the globe: from Australia to Canada; from Chile to Asia; across Europe, and in many dozens of cities throughout the United States. What is it about Nike that would inspire such a strong reaction from tens and hundreds of thousands of people? Did protesters really find fault with this Nike way of life?

The charge was that the Way of the Swoosh might be a fine thing to peddle, but that it's a lie. That despite the ideals that the swoosh seems to stand for, despite the hip image, despite the role–model spokespeople, despite the progressive claims. Phil Knight is no different than the robber barons of (we hoped) bygone eras. That his wealth comes at the expense of the inhuman poverty of his workers. Nike seems to be leading the field in what Thomas Frank has called "the commodification of dissent." The particulars of the case against Nike are, sadly, unambiguous. The facts have been documented by virtually every major newspaper, by labor, religious and human rights groups worldwide, by congress–people, and most recently, by ESPN. The words used are always the same: child labor, sexual harassment, sweatshops. Take the example of China, where human rights groups tell how workers sewing Nike shoes make 19 cents an hour, below the legal minimum wage of $1.93 per day, which is itself well below a subsistence wage. Thirteen–year–olds work throughout the factories, and workers are forced to work close to 200 hours of overtime each month to make enough to survive. In Vietnam, according to Nike's own accounting firm Ernst & Young, the air in the factories is so bad that 78 percent of employees have respiratory problems, and as punishment, workers are forced to kneel with their hands in the air for 25 minutes, and are hit on the head and neck with Nike sneakers. And of course, in all of the East Asian and South Asian countries where Nike shoes are made, the military can be counted upon to crack some heads if workers start to get uppity and try to demand any rights. What does all this have to do with the swoosh lifestyle, and more importantly, what does it have to do with us? The selling of the ideal of the swoosh has been so successful as to make Nike one of the richest corporations in the world, one which could easily afford to treat its workers with the basic respect that they deserve. Phil Knight could afford to pay all of his workers wages they could live on and still be a multi–billionaire. Why does he continue then to betray the ideals that are packaged in that swoosh? Because we're still buying it. Teenagers and college students are the primary target demographic for Nike, and we have yet to tell Knight to clean up his act. Until recently, at least. Saturday's mobilization was massive, and there are signs that Nike is starting to feel the pressure. The public scrutiny is forcing people to begin to wonder just how sincere that swoosh really is. Students around the country are passing resolutions condemning Nike's practices, and also targeting Universities to implement codes of conduct for those who apparel sold in University stores or with University logos. More than anything, it is collective student action which is going to bring Nike around. But the struggle to bring Nike into line with our image of them is not an easy one. Universities are reluctant to give up the money from phat Nike contracts with sports teams. At UMass, for instance, Nike has contracts with the Athletic Department. Despite repeated requests, however, the Department has so far refused to make these contracts public for student inspection. In this way, we all become implicated in Nike's practices. Next Tuesday, an expert on Nike's use of sweatshops will be coming to the Campus Center at 7 p.m. to talk about some of these issues. We have an opportunity to join the growing movement to force Nike to rethink its actions. We have the ability to reclaim the swoosh for ourselves and for the ideals it could represent, and to hold Nike up to our standards. Let's just do it.

Jon Zerolnick is a UMass graduate student.

Only a start

Yesterday, two workers from a sweatshop in the Dominican Republic that makes hats which bear the Harvard name stood in front of the John Harvard statue and described the abysmal conditions of their workplace. The workers in this factory are paid 8 cents for every $20 that, forced to work overtime, harassed, mistreated and rendered unable to further their education or unionize, according to event organizers. The administration is said to be looking into the matter, and Students for a Sweat-free Campus are doing their best to make sure that the University adopts an effective code of conduct that will make it impossible to affix the Harvard name to sweatshop products.

UWIRE

We are inspired by the number of students who attended the rally yesterday and heartened by the nearly 2,000 students who signed a petition in support of a code of conduct which contains provisions for a living wage, freedom of association, independent monitoring and a ban on harassment. It is hard to see why the administration would object to any of these provisions and we urge the University to adopt an effective code before the end of the school year.

As consumers we must work to limit suffering by consuming responsibly and insisting that the institutions into which we pour our money act responsibly.

While we are happy to see students taking aim at BJ & B's factory in the Dominican Republic, this particular shop is only one of many. Men, women and children are being beaten, harassed and essentially enslaved so that Americans can have cheap apparel. As consumers we must work to limit suffering by consuming responsibly and insisting that the institutions into which we pour our money act responsibly. Sweatshops are bad and we should do our best to punish those who strive to profit from the suffering of others. But rather than striving to stomp out each individual sweatshop, we wonder if we shouldn't search for the root of the problem. In all the sweat-free flurry, it seem that we have forgotten to ask why sweatshops exist at all.

We have too readily accepted the notion that employers will strive to exploit their workers and that only a skein of laws, regulations and codes can prevent enormous suffering. Exploitation, abuse and greed are not inherent elements of the system. As Sollent article: "The new complex is being built because there is a demand for quality housing and khaki pants which is not currently being met in Central Square. Meddling with these irrepressible forces results in distortion." This type of simplistic faith in the Truth of the market, and espousal of the value of submitting to the machinations of the market, disturbs us almost as much as sweatshop horror stories.

We refuse to believe that we are all inherently self-interested pawns in a vast teleological game played by invisible hands. The myth that the laws of the free market will inexorably lead us to the light at the end of some economic and social tunnel is just that — a myth, and a dangerous one at that. We refuse to believe that we must live amidst exploitation, inhumanity, greed and massive inequality, and call this "irrepressible." We refuse to believe that stopping a sweatshop here and there is the best we can do.

profit and efficiency gone astray — but they are the product of capitalism nonetheless, and as such they should shake people's unflagging faith in our economic system. The two of us struggle to fathom placing such blind faith in a system which produces enormous income disparities, divides American social and economic life along racial lines and puts a Starbucks on every affluent corner.

The Econ 101 mentality teaches us that there are winners (like Bill Gates) and losers (like inner-city America) in our system, and that this is not only "fine," but the way it should be. And campus publications act as an endless reserve of proof that many of our fellow classmates seem to believe wholeheartedly in the sanctity of the market.

In response to community attempts to prevent the Holmes development in Central Square, Cabot Henderson wrote the following in a March 16 Sollent article: "The new complex is being built because there is a demand for quality housing and khaki pants which is not currently being met in Central Square. Meddling with these irrepressible forces results in distortion." This type of simplistic faith in the Truth of the market, and espousal of the value of submitting to the machinations of the market, disturbs us almost as much as sweatshop horror stories.

Culture clash

"Ah–Lin, don't cause trouble. Just try to get along with everybody," my mother says to me in Cantonese.

"But, Ma. I don't want to get stepped all over by people," I say.

"It's not a matter of getting stepped all over. In life, not everything goes your way. People won't like you if you are so bold. If someone does something bad to you, then treat them better. Always be the better person," my mother instructs me.

There goes the dynamics that seem to be dominating the relationship that I am having with my mother these days — whether or not to speak my mind.

I'm waging a war within myself to get rid of the nice–girl syndrome my mother has passed down to me.

Lilian Chan

All of my life my mother has always stressed to me the importance of getting along with everybody. I shouldn't express my anger verbally to people's faces (behind their backs is okay). What I am supposed to do is suck it up and deal. I've been listening to her for the past 20 years. For those 20 years, I have remained silent and in the process have suppressed almost all of what and how I feel. I have a difficult time telling someone something as simple as if they're pissing me off, and that's sad. I'm like a teapot that's at its boiling point and can no longer keep the lid on.

Well, I can't suck it up and deal anymore. There have been many times when I've tried to speak my mind. Usually, I have been unsuccessful at being vocal, but lately I've been making some gains.

I was at a meeting one day and there was this heated discussion. Out of the blue, I heard myself speaking up and actually disagreeing with somebody. It felt real good, but that's been just one time.

Usually, there is this wall that seems to be lodged in my throat that I just can't bulldoze my way through. The words I want to say out loud are on the tip of my tongue. All I need is that extra push to make it come out, but usually the wall is just too strong for me to break.

Recently, I had asked some fellow classmates to do something for our class project. They promised and I was counting on them. But, when the time came, they didn't deliver. I was really upset at them and had planned a whole speech on how disappointed I was in them and how irresponsible they were. When I saw them, though, everything I had planned to say fell through. Once I was face to face with them, my whole persona changed. I was extremely pleasant and asked them nicely if they would please finish what I had asked them to. Inside, I was cursing up a storm and more than ready to explode at them with all of my rage, but I remained calm on the outside.

"Lillian, I know that you really wanted to tell them off. I was hoping that you'd scream at them. I could tell that you were mad, but then you stopped yourself. Why couldn't you just say it?" my friend Kieu asked me.

It's like I have multiple personalities. It freaks me out sometimes how easy it is for me to suppress my feelings. I'm going through my life living a lie by not being able to tell people how I really feel. I'm such a fraud.

It has to do with my fear that if I tell people how I feel and what I really feel, then they won't like me anymore. My mother's words start to kick in right about now. In my mind, I know that it doesn't matter — that it shouldn't matter — whether or not people like me. But it does matter.

My mother has raised me to be agreeable because her mother raised her the same way and so on. It's safe to say that it's a tradition in my family. From the time I was a little girl up till now, my mother has always stressed to me the importance of being a good girl.

My mother has carried her mother's lessons — to be submissive. I was born in a different time and place with a different set of ideals — to just be yourself. I'm waging a war within myself to get rid of the nice–girl syndrome my mother has passed down to me. I can't take it anymore.

My mother has never said a bad word to anybody even when people have said bad words to her. She was at work the other day when a co–worker of hers started swearing at her for misplacing something. My mother just ignored her and the next day she bought some pastries for that co– worker. Now they're friends.

I can understand why she wants me to be like her. Life is easier if you don't cause any waves. Nobody will see you in a bad light. You'll have friends and people will love you from all over.

The problem with all of that is it's boring. Who wants to go through their lives being the passenger? I don't, "Drivers wanted," as the people from Volkswagen would say.

Besides, if I continue to be a passenger for the rest of my life, I would miss out on so much because I would just be going with the flow — following what other people do and what they say.

I want to be the strong person that I know I can be. I want to be able to be straight up with how I feel and not be afraid of expressing it. And, I don't want to go with the flow.

It's time to stop being such a nice girl. Grrr!

Letters to the Editor

Theatre guild a success story

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the letter written by Pete Giraldi in the April 15 issue of the Collegian. I would like to know if Giraldi has ever gone to any other theater productions or to the movies before? If that answer is yes, then he has suspended his disbelief for the sake of entertainment before, and that is what he should have attempted to do when viewing Jesus Christ Superstar a few weeks ago.

The UMass Theater Guild stresses the fact that everyone should try something new. Something that hasn't been done before. That is what the director of Jesus Christ Superstar did. He attempted something way out there. We push for students to not worry about failure. If we fail, it's a learning experience. If we succeed, then we add that to success stories here at the University of Massachusetts, and that's where you'll find Jesus Christ Superstar, in the success stories.

I completely understand that the concept for Jesus Christ Superstar was really out there, and it wasn't the normal theatrical experience that Giraldi may have expected, but come on now, it is theater! The great thing about theater is that you can be anyone you want to be, and you can do anything you want to do. I sincerely apologize to Giraldi for the fact that he was offended and the fact that he couldn't understand the modernization of the material. I truly do. But, next time you want to write about something, especially a Registered Student Organization (RSO), maybe you should attempt to do a little research first.

I thank Giraldi again for attending the show, and hope that next time his disbelief will be suspended and he'll sit back, relax, and enjoy the show, as everyone did.

Tara M. McRae
Chairperson, UMass Theater Guild

Big Brothers & Sisters give thanks

To the editor:

On Saturday, April 4, Big Brothers Big Sisters of Hampshire County held its annual fundraising bowl–a–thon. It was our most successful ever, capturing the best of the spirit of our community. Big and little brothers and sisters joined together with members of the community to bowl, raise money and have a party for a program that embodies the notion of "taking a village to raise a child."

Bowlers reflected the breadth of support the program derives from the community: a number of sororities and fraternities from the University of Massachusetts; high school students; police officers; United Parcel Service drivers; human service personnel; people affiliated with Department of Social Services, insurance companies, banks and small businesses; elementary school teachers; and of course many big and little brothers and sisters. Over 60 businesses sponsored the event. This kind of support is vital to the program and greatly appreciated by everyone involved.

Of special note this year is the participation of sororities and fraternities. Kappa Kappa Gamma, Delta Upsilon, Delta Chi, Phi Mu Delta and Pi Kappa Alpha sent teams who raised money and showed up with great spirit and enthusiasm. This spirit exemplifies how both the Greek community and the community at large can interact in a mutually beneficial way. We want to publicly acknowledge, appreciate and thank the sorority and fraternity sisters and brothers for supporting our "sisters" and "brothers." We hope this relationship will become an ongoing one.

Once again, on behalf of everyone at Big Brothers Big Sisters of Hampshire County, I want to thank all the participants and behind the scenes supporters who made this year's bowl–a–thon such an outstanding success.

Cape Verdean night a success

To the editor:

Saturday night's 16th Annual Cape Verdean Night was a reaffirmation to the purpose, to the cause of cultural student groups. Too often cries of unity fall on deaf ears here at our "diversified" campus. And why shouldn't they when they are nothing more than tired cliches?

Finally, a few bold rarities stepped forward and boldly proclaimed that they would follow. UMass student Hamilton Rodrigues spoke on behalf of "The Next Generation of Cape Verdeans" and set a trend for the genuine testimonies that would follow. Working through his initially nervous address, Rodrigues gradually found comfort in the faces of the crowd and relaxed as he expressed his personal desires, ambitions and idiosyncrasies. He accomplished what he had set out to do, put a faces to the concept of what being a Cape Verdean means. Rodrigues let the campus in on a long–concealed secret; there are individuals of color on this campus, in this nation, that are starved for cultural nourishment and they will not be denied for it is a fundamental human need that fuels them.

University of Connecticut student Jorge Andrade swooped down on the audience with an intimate message that completely deviated from the speech he had prepared, based on his need to speak from the heart. Andrade spoke almost mournfully of the cultural division that manifests itself among Cape Verdeans, some of whom choose to disassociate themselves from their African roots. He spoke on behalf of Africans, of black unity and acceptance, lamenting, "We separate ourselves because of the legacy and mentality of colonialism."

I wish to applaud these and other members of the Cape Verdean Student Alliance for putting an end to all the false showmanship, for reminding the UMass community that a silent majority is in the wings and will not be silenced, no matter the opposition. And that's no cliche.

"Celebrate Series" closes with concert finale tonight

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

The fourth and final concert in the "Celebrate the Piano Series," presented by the Department of Music & Dance, will take place tonight at 8:15 p.m. in Bezanson Recital Hall.

For the final concert of the series, visiting pianist Maria Szraiber will perform works by Frederik Chopin and Claude Debussy.

Szraiber is a professor of piano and director of the piano department at the Warsaw Academy of Music in Poland. Performing regularly as a soloist and chamber musician throughout Europe, Japan and South Korea, Szraiber has also recorded extensively for Polish National Radio and made numerous appearances on Polish television.

For this evening's performance, Szraiber will include waltzes, mazurkas, a scherzo, barcarole and ballad by Chopin. The portion of the program dedicated to Debussy will include 12 preludes from Book II.

The proceeds from this concert go toward the Bezanson Recital Hall Renovation Fund. Courtesy of a local patron, a new, nine-foot Steinway concert grand piano was donated to the Department of Music & Dance. In order to compliment this gorgeous instrument, the department felt it needed to create an uplifting environment in which concert-goers can experience beautiful music.

In constant use since 1976, Bezanson has provided a venue for thousands of concerts. Some of the projected renovations include acoustic isolation from outside noise, wood panelling, new seating, improved lighting, new stage floor, improved lobby and greenroom.

Chancellor David Scott presented the Department of Music & Dance with a challenge to help raise funds for the renovation of Bezanson. The University will match, dollar for dollar up to $150,000 gifts made to the Renovation Fund between Jan. 3 and July 1.

The department is urging music lovers to consider the important role that Bezanson Recital hall plays in the musical life of the Pioneer Valley. Many donors have already established their own named chair (with a plaque affixed thereupon) by making a $500 contribution. Donors may make checks out to the UMass Music Department, with a notation "BRH Fund," and send it to BRH Fund, Department of Music and Dance, Fine Arts Center, UMass, Amherst, MA 01003. For additional information, please contact Marilyn Kushick (413-545-0018) or Ernest May (413-545-4515).

Tickets to the concert are $5 for students, elders and children, and $8 for the general public. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office at (413) 545-2511 or at the door of Bezanson Recital Hall on the evening of April 22.

Aniston, Rudd shine in Object of My Affection

By Rob Roensch
Collegian Staff

THE OBJECT OF MY AFFECTION
Directed by Nicholas Hynter
with Jennifer Aniston, Paul Rudd and Alan Alda
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

The goal of most romantic comedies is to keep the obviously destined-to-be-together protagonists apart for most of the movie so that the union, when it comes, will satisfy us and send us out into the mail with an embarrassing, dreamy warmth beneath our ribs. The happy ending is almost always an actual or implied heterosexual marriage, but in The Object of my Affection, as in the recent Chasing Amy, one of the protagonists is gay. In both cases, homosexuality is at first most important as a plot obstacle to union, but only in The Object of my Affection is sexuality not simply overwhelmed by love.

Nina (Jennifer Aniston) is a quick-witted, excitable woman who is always a little unsure of how to hold herself. She is a mere social worker sprung from a wealthy family. She becomes pregnant by a man she does not love and suddenly gains purpose, not the sudden need to care for a child, but more the desire to lead a family her own way instead of always being the odd duck. She asks her best friend, George, (Paul Rudd) to help her raise the baby, and then falls in love with him. He loves her back and, although they almost have sex, he cannot be in love with her. Then it gets complicated.

While Chasing Amy was notable for its similar and even more fierce taboo-free treatment of sex, its plot was drawn with fingerpaints. Chasing Amy was a great portrait of twenty-something confusion and the train wreck of relationships, but in the end it adds up to an interesting muddle of romantic longing and jokes about fisting. In contrast, the equally complicated Affection is more concise, even streamlined. Its ending satisfies all expectations of happiness, but it is happy in a fundamentally different way.

Praised for its honesty, Chasing Amy exists outside of genre bounds and mainstream Hollywood, while Affection exists within them and changes them from the inside. Where Chasing Amy was Kevin Smith's personal vision, complete with stunningly crude cinematography, Affection has few personal touches, no tricky camera work, no strange colors, no jerky editing. The fact that Object is so obviously a Hollywood product only makes its innovation more important. Hollywood is an excellent, efficient storytelling machine. The problem with Hollywood is not the smooth style, it is that the stories themselves are often cliched or just plain stupid. With The Object of My Affection, Hollywood proves that it can tell a socially important story when it wants to, and it can tell it well.

The conflicts are eventually resolved, but not easily. There is loneliness and selfishness and pure lack of consideration all around, not only plot difficulties like an evil boyfriend. The movie juggles pure romantic longing, pop-feminism, issues of the modern family and homosexuality so smoothly the surface of the story remains shiny and undisturbed. The movie is as entertaining as an exceptional Hollywood love story, but also has a lot on its mind.

Although both Aniston and Rudd are warm and wonderful, a great deal of credit for the movie's success can be given to the screenwriter, playwright Wendy Wasserstein. Her script is taut, witty and gentle; despite a few dips to silly, if funny, sitcom level farce, Wasserstein lets her characters be people, tender and essentially good but also, at times, irrational jerks. Further, she surrounds the two leads with approximately a dozen carefully drawn supporting characters who all affect or are affected by the main plot. It's here Wasserstein gets in most of her commentary on relationships and social issues: the old academic whose unfulfilled infatuation with an actor parallels Nina's, the older sister's frighteningly offhand racism and heterosexism. The movie is dense with interrelated characters that become like an extended family as the movie progresses, untidy, fragmented, but still a family.

The movie's greatest moment is its ending, unequivocally happy, as the genre of romantic comedy requires, but with the protagonists separated. Equally as important, mother and father do not live together, but the child has both. And Nina, a white woman, finds love with a black cop — a racial issue that is thrillingly and pointedly unimportant. Admittedly, the ending is probably a little too easy, a "family" of all different races and sexual orientations coming together at the same first grade musical performance, but romantic comedies are supposed to dream, and this is an important dream that has never been translated to mainstream movie screens quite so firmly or so well. Goodie Mob's latest fails to justify all of the hype

STILL STANDING
Goodie Mob
LaFace

This album comes with a lot of hype, especially after their brilliant and well-received Soul Food. Then the Goodie Mob continued their dominance with a world tour, opening up for the Roots, and rang the bell of every place they visited. So now that they are no longer the unknown kids on the block, the question is can they keep it rolling?

Unfortunately no. While Still Standing is by no means a bad album, just don't believe the hype. "They Don't Dance No Mo'" opens this album on a positive tip. The song confronts the issue of kids no longer going to clubs and concerts to dance or have a good time but to look tough and start trouble. The Mob flows smoothly and the beats are thumping enough that it has gained almost constant rotation on BET. The only thing is, like most of this album, it sounds like they are borrowing their flow from the Outkast.

"Beautiful Skin" the second single, is another positive message that's just done all wrong. While it is obviously a song that talks about women respecting themselves, it comes off like women should respect themselves because the Goodie Mob doesn't want to have anything to do with chickenheads. That hypocrisy sums up this album: there are a lot of good ideas that are just went about the wrong way. For proof check "Just About Over," the song features live music but instead of some phat blues or jazz riffs they sound like they borrowed a b-version Rage Against the Machine.

You hate to dis an album with such a positive message, especially considering the state of hip-hop today, but the bottom line is your album still has to bump. If you sweat the southern style, you might enjoy this album more than I did, but as far as I'm concerned, bring on a second helping of Soul Food. C (Adam Dlugacz)

BECOMING REMIXED
Sneaker Pimps
Virgin/Clean Up

If Sonic Youth experimented with techno, you would have the Sneaker Pimps. Becoming Remixed is a collection of remixes and alterations on songs featured on the Becoming X album. The result is infectiously catchy grooves which spark new interest in and, in some cases, enhance their old material.

The best tracks on Becoming Remixed are new versions of the best tracks on Becoming X. "Post Modern Sleaze," with three new remixes, is lots of fun, and the Perfecto Remix of "6 Underground" is a vast improvement on the original.

At a time when electronic music is one of the few genres of music that continue to be evolving, Sneaker Pimps are a group to follow. If you own Becoming X it is necessary to own Becoming Remixed in order to make the album complete. Becoming Remixed makes the perfect companion piece to Becoming X. A- (Kevin Monahan)

Huskies down crew team; A-10s are this weekend

By Aaron M. Saykin
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts women's crew coach Jim Dietz has always warned his athletes that outdoor sports can be subject to unusual weather conditions.

However, when one of his coxswains is uncertain about the safety of a course, it becomes difficult for his rowers to keep their focus.

Such was the case last Saturday, when the Minutewomen traveled to Boston to compete against Northeastern and Columbia along the Charles River, which happened to resemble the northern coast of Maine rather than the tranquility with which the UMass rowers were familiar.

Caught in the confusion and chaos of a rapid river, the Minutewomen managed to down Columbia, but were upset by the host Huskies in their most frustrating race of the 1998 campaign.

"The wind conditions were pretty bad Saturday. The water was too rough, and we could barely get through it," said Dietz, who suggested that the weather played a key role last weekend, but also felt that his team did not perform to its potential.

"It's disappointing. I think the weather had a little bit to do with it, but you can't put the whole blame on it."

Hoping to atone for a loss to Virginia in its last race two weekends ago, UMass was hoping to get back on pace by toppling Northeastern for the third consecutive season.

As luck would have it, the Minutewomen were stymied by Mother Nature and the Huskies, both of whom dictated the tempo of the competition from its opening moments.

"Northeastern jumped off the line to a great start and we never caught up to them. It's definitely a wake-up call for us," said Dietz of his squad, which finished second in the nation last year at the NCAA Championships.

"After the race, I told the women that if you fall off a horse, you have to get right back on it. We know we have speed, the frustrating thing is that we haven't been able to prove it."

Although discouraged after Saturday's loss, UMass rebounded on Sunday in New Jersey by handily defeating Villanova along the Cooper River, where the Atlantic 10 Championships will be held this Saturday.

"It's a definite advantage for us to be able to race on the course before the A-10s," Dietz said. "It gives us a sense of the course and a dress rehearsal for this weekend."

Having captured the past two A-10 titles, the Minutewomen hope to rebound from a tough weekend with their third straight crown, something Dietz feels is well within their reach.

"I think we're going to do very well this weekend," he said. "If we win it, this will be our third in a row. It won't be easy, though. George Washington is getting much stronger."

As a result of their defeat, UMass will likely drop from their rank as the top crew squad in New England. However, Dietz doesn't see that as necessarily a bad thing.

"All we have to do is make it to the tournament," he said. "Once we're there, everyone is on level ground."

Manchester, tennis team finish 5th

ALEXANDER KOROLKOVAS / COLLEGIAN

The final match
The Massachusetts women's tennis team squared off with Fairfield University yesterday at Upper Boyden Courts. They will also host Boston University today at 2:30 p.m.

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team captured fifth place last weekend at the Atlantic 10 tournament in Blacksburg, Va.

The Minutemen came into the tournament ranked sixth, but some gritty wins allowed them to slightly outdo expectations.

"This team has always exhibited a strong desire to be successful," Massachusetts coach Judy Dixon said. "They have also had a knack for finding ways to win when they are down, and they did that on several occasions this weekend."

The Minutemen began their weekend on a positive note, by edging past 11th seeded La Salle 4-3.

While the match was much closer than expected, the Minutemen came up with the big shots when they needed them most.

"There were a lot of tight matches here, but Bo Navarro's play really pushed us over the top," Dixon said. "He was emotional and very inspirational as he played on despite severe pain."

Navarro had been playing at the sixth spot despite a herniated disc. He defeated Andy Pessano, 6-0, 6-2, nevertheless.

Rob Manchester and Alex Aller took straight set victories against La Salle, after Todd Cheney dropped a tough three setter against Ed Colfer.

UMass had been hoping to draw George Washington later on, but the bracket paired the teams in the next round. The Minutemen were outmatched and fell, 6-1, to the Colonials without too much of a fight.

"The team was exhausted from the previous match," Dixon said. "I am not one for excuses, but the first match took way too much out of them physically."

Manchester picked up the lone singles victory against GW, with an impressive, 6-4, 6-4 conquering of Kent Wright.

From there, UMass knocked off Dayton, 4-3, in another nailbiter to earn a chance to play for fifth place overall.

Manchester again was left to determine the outcome, as he was the last player on the court against Dayton. He took care of Jeff Kockly in three sets to give UMass the win.

In the final match of the weekend, the Minutemen once again won by a score of, 4-3, proving there is some consistency to their game.

"It was a strong finish for us," Manchester said. "We did what we were expected to do, and a little bit more. We would have liked to gotten GW later on, but that's not the way it worked out."

Manchester, who was undefeated for the tournament, rightfully was honored with a spot on the All-Tournament team.

"Last year, I made it a goal to be on the team, but I thought about that too much, and played with too many nerves," Manchester said. "This year, I just played tennis, and concentrated on my game and everything went well."

appearance will be short-lived.

Advantage: Colorado
Phoenix will square off with Detroit in the three vs. six game. The defending Stanley Cup champs should not be counted out to repeat this year. The Coyotes don't have enough weapons to overcome the Red Wings, and although they may push this one to seven games, they'll fall short in the end.

Advantage: Detroit
The final matchup between St. Louis and Los Angeles may prove to be the best series of them all. Neither team has garnered much recognition this year, but both are capable of pulling off some surprises. It's too close to call on this one, but I think that both teams are capable of reaching the conference finals with some upsets.

Advantage: push
Well, enough from me. Let's see what actually does happen.

UMass downs Eagles, 7–2, in Beanpot semis

Gautreau, UM have grand day with showing on Yawkey Way

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — There's just something about playing at Fenway Park that seems to bring out the best in the Massachusetts baseball team.

The Minutemen have won the last two Beanpot titles in the second oldest ballpark in the majors, and took a step towards making it a three–peat with a 7–2 win over Boston College in semifinals yesterday afternoon.

"Honestly, it's a break for me as far as motivation. I don't have to have them juiced up to play because if you come here, you're going to be excited to play," Massachusetts coach Mike Stone said. "It's something to look forward to each year."

Once again it was senior right–hander Scott Barnsby rising to the occasion at Fenway. The UMass co–captain pitched eight innings while allowing only two runs and striking out seven.

"I have a lot of confidence when I pitch here. I hurt my arm earlier this year, but it's a comfortable atmosphere whenever I come here," Barnsby said. "It's not just me, it's the whole team. We always come ready to play."

The Minutemen did come ready to play against the Eagles, striking for two runs in the bottom of the first off BC starter Andy Sullivan. Bryan Mazzaferro doubled with one out and scored on an RBI single by second baseman Muchie Dagliere, who set a new UMass single–season hitting streak record by getting a base knock in his 29th consecutive game. After Doug Clark reached courtesy an error, right fielder Pete Gautreau singled home Dagliere to give UMass a 2–0 lead.

"I was more nervous last game [Sunday against Fordham] about it, because if I didn't tie it, then I wouldn't have had the chance to break it," said Dagliere, who upped his team leading average to .462 with a 3–for–4 afternoon. "Once I got that hit [on Sunday], I didn't really care about it anymore, because even if I didn't get a hit today, then I would still have tied the record. Then I got that hit the first at bat today and got that out of the way, so now I don't have to worry about it anymore."

The UMass hit parade continued in the fourth, when Mazzaferro led off the frame with a walk. Dagliere and Clark both followed with singles, and Gautreau sent a Sullivan offering off the Green Monster, plating Mazzaferro and Dagliere, and increasing the UMass lead to 4–0.

"I don't know why, but I always feel real comfortable here," said Gautreau, who also threw out a BC base runner on a play at the plate. "Throwing someone out from right field is always a thrill, and I've always wanted to hit the Green Monster. Maybe next time I'll hit one over it."

Brian Samela kept the inning going with a single to left field which reloaded the bases for Aaron Braunstein. The UMass left fielder responded with a single to left field on which Clark scored, but Gautreau was gunned down at the plate by Chang Choe of Boston College. Matt Wolcott added a sacrifice fly later in the frame to put UMass ahead 6–0 after four innings.

Barnsby kept cruising along into the sixth until he encountered a little trouble. Mike Gambino singled to lead off the inning, and David Bingham followed with a walk. Both runners would score on a double by Mike Quirk to make it 6–2, but Barnsby settled down to retire the next three Eagles in order and end the threat.

UMass would then tack on the game's final run in the seventh. Dagliere doubled with two outs, and came home on an RBI single by Clark.

Although a date with Harvard, which was an 11–0 winner over Northeastern in the day's first game, awaits the Minutemen tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m. in the Beanpot finals, UMass will first have to set their sights on the University of Maine, who will take on the Minutemen tomorrow afternoon in a 4 p.m. start in Portland, Maine.

"We're playing at Hadlock Field, which is another nice ballpark, so we have to get excited about that," Stone said. "Maine has always been one of the better teams in New England, but we just have to take things one game at a time."

UMass takes pair from Huskies

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team is on a roll.

With yesterday's 2–1, 3–0 sweep of local rival Connecticut (19–19–1), the Minutewomen (31–12) extended their winning streak to eight games. They have now won 28 of their last 31 games, and have clinched a spot in the Atlantic 10 tournament. With a sweep of St. Joseph's on Saturday they can take the No. 1 seed in the conference.

"I can't remember the last time that UMass beat UConn twice on a given day," UMass softball coach Elaine Sortino said. "It's been a long time, and anytime that happens, you have to feel good about it. We could have done some things better, but we still won two games from a very good team."

In the first game UMass got off to a slow start, and UConn jumped out with the early lead, scoring a run in the second. Junior outfielder Amanda Young had an RBI double to make it 1–0 in favor of the Huskies. Young was the key to the hosts' slow start, as the UMass offense had trouble getting used to the pitcher's style.

"It took us a while to adjust to her," Sortino said. "She was a little different than what we've seen in a while."

UMass finally got its offense in motion in the fourth inning. Freshman Annie Smith had her second career game–winning RBI when she knocked a double to right field.

"I had been in a slump for a long–time, and coach had me into a new position, where I spread my legs out and stay low and see the ball," Smith said. "So I went up there and tried it, and I got my hit. That put us up, so I was really excited."

Senior Kim Gutridge got things started with a single to center field. She was replaced at first with junior pinchrunner Katie Kenderski. Kenderski advanced to second base when senior designated player Kelly Buckley hit another single to center field. Junior left fielder Becky George was up next, and while her hit wasn't enough to get her to first base, it did advance Kenderski to third and Buckley to second. Smith followed George at the plate, and with her hit she brought in Kenderski and Buckley for the winning runs.

Junior pitcher Danielle Henderson came through for UMass, totaling 10 strikeouts while allowing four hits.

Freshman Carrie Jelfries pitched a shutout for the Minutewomen in the nightcap. She had three strikeouts and scattered five hits. The rest of UMass defense was a big factor in preventing UConn from scoring any runs.

"Our defense held very well, and I think that's why we won today," Sortino said.

Once again the fourth inning was the site of all the action, this time with Buckley becoming the hero of the game. She had a double to left field that scored three runs. With junior Mandy Galas, senior Tracey Osier and Gutridge all having been walked by UConn pitcher Jill Cameron, the stage was set for Buckley to come through.

"When I was on deck, I knew that the pitcher was going to walk her [Gutridge], and I see those situations as opportunities, so I was ready. When I went up there I felt like I would drive it in," Buckley said.

Tracey Osier, the reigning ECAC/Reebok Player of the Week, helped lead the UMass softball team to a sweep of Connecticut yesterday afternoon.

Quest for hockey's top honor down to 16 playoff squads

Michael Kobylanski
On the NHL

I'm not a prophet by any means, but I'm going to give this a shot and make my predictions for the first round of the NHL playoffs.

Of course, I have reason to be disappointed because my beloved Carolina Hurricanes choked down the stretch and missed out on the playoffs once again.

But that's another story for another day.

Eastern Conference

There are several intriguing matchups here. New Jersey will go up against Ottawa in the No. 1 vs. No. 8 game. The Devils have one of the game's top goalies in Martin Brodeur and had the best record in the Eastern Conference this year.

Ottawa is a team that is made of very few stars. Not too many names other than Alexei Yashin and Daniel Alfredsson could be considered household ones in this day and age. The Senators will bring true grit into this series, but you need more than that to eliminate the Devils.

Advantage: New Jersey

The two/seven matchup will pit Northeast Division champ Pittsburgh against the Canadiens. Neither of these teams were expected to have campaigns like they did, but here they are in the playoffs.

The Penguins have the offensive firepower with Jaromir Jagr, Ron Francis and Stu Barnes. The defensive core is pretty solid as well, with Sergei Zubov and Darius Kasparitis teaming up to create a formidable backline.

Advantage: Pittsburgh

Philadelphia is going to try to move on the next round, but it is going to have to deal with Dominik Hasek first. I don't care who the Flyers have offensively, their goaltending is marginal at best, and Hasek always seems to rise to the occasion in crunch time.

Advantage: Buffalo

The final series has the Bruins facing Washington. The Capitals get the home–ice advantage, which will probably be key, as I foresee a game seven. This series is going to depend on whether or not the Boston defense can step up and contain Peter Bondra and Adam Oates. If it does, then this series could be over quickly, but if they don't the Caps may get a nice rest before the second round begins.

Advantage: Boston

Western Conference

Dallas gets San Jose in the opening round of the playoffs. For all four Sharks fans reading this, forget about another upset like the one over Detroit a few years back. This one may be over in four games. Dallas didn't have the best record in the league for nothing.

Advantage: Dallas

Colorado has the task of facing Edmonton, one of the best up–and–coming teams in the league. The Oilers, however, have been streaky this year. They finished up strong, and with a veteran team like the Avalanche as their opponent, their playoff

Women's lax to face off with UVM

By Jamie Jae
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will look to rebound from last weekend's loss to Syracuse when it plays its second home game in a row, this time against the University of Vermont. UMass (6–4) will meet the Catamounts today at 4 p.m. on Totman Field.

Despite the loss Sunday, the Minutewomen still managed to record the best start for the women's lacrosse program since the 1987 season, when they also started out at 6–4.

UMass' narrow win over Hofstra last week ensured them of at least tying the mark.

Despite a late rally by junior attack Laura Korutz and freshman attack Fay Naber, UMass could not hold off the Orangewomen, but will not likely be caught off guard today, as it faces a team in the midst of a six game losing streak.

Vermont comes into today's contest still in the process of rebuilding. The Catamounts are 1–9 this year, 0–6 in America East play. The team is playing under a new coach this year, Harvard graduate Sarah Nelson, who will face–off with a fellow alum in UMass coach Francesca McClellan.

Noelle Gorsky

Vermont has struggled this year, after finishing 2–10, 0–6 in America East last season. The Minutewomen will try to spark their season finish today, as following the contest against the Catamounts loom Boston College, New Hampshire, and Boston University — all teams UMass defeated last year.

Today's game will be important in that it will be used as a rough indicator of how well the Minutewomen should fare throughout the remainder of the season. Vermont has already faced both UNH and BU, dropping 14–4 and 18–3 decisions respectively.

While UMass should have little trouble against the green squad from the North, the Minutewomen will at least be able to use the game as a tuneup to this weekend's action, which includes away dates with Boston College and UNH.

UMass will be wary of this team, however, as it will be hungry for a win. In addition, last season's matchup with the Catamounts will likely resurface to the minds of many returning players, a game that saw the Minutewomen come out stale in the first half, forcing them to scrap out an eventual 10–8 victory.

UMass will hope to have the tenacity Korutz and Naber showed at the end of Sunday's game early today, as the Minutewomen will look to jump out to a quick advantage with several offensive schemes that should prove effective against a soft Vermont defense. The Catamounts have allowed an average of 15 scores a game.

Vermont will counter the UMass attack with senior tri– captains Melanie Arnold (midfielder), Kate Farnsworth (goalie) and Jen Schoeler (attack).

Korutz continues to lead the Minutewomen with 29 points and is joined by senior attack Jen Bowen, junior midfielder Melissa Anderson, and sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick as the only players to start all 10 games.

Puerto Rico campaigns for official statehood

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) — Refusing to take "no" for an answer, Puerto Rico's pro–statehood governor is determined to convince the Senate that it's time the Caribbean island gets a chance to join the Union.

Gov. Pedro Rossello returned to Washington yesterday for the second time in a month to lobby for legislation that would authorize an island referendum on Puerto Rico's political status.

On April 1, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott told Rossello that there wasn't enough time to consider the measure this year — the centennial of Puerto Rico's takeover by the United States. But buoyed by a March vote in the House of Representatives supporting a plebiscite, Rossello said Tuesday he hoped to change Lott's mind.

"The fact is that for 100 years the Stars and Stripes have been in Puerto Rico and that this is an unresolved issue," the governor said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"We have a historic opportunity now and that both from the perspective of Puerto Rico and the perspective of the nation (it is) something that has to be tackled."

Senate votes to pass education legislation

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate voted yesterday to ban tests based on national standards in reading and math and convert some federal education programs to block grants as a nearly passage of a bill to create tax–free savings accounts for school expenses.

The conservative amendments all but guaranteed that the legislation would not get past President Clinton. He has promised a veto of the savings bill, arguing that it would largely benefit affluent parents sending children to private schools.

A vote on final passage is expected today.

Although no legislation is likely to result, the debate has given Republicans and Democrats a chance to highlight their major differences over education, a key issue in this congressional election year.

Republicans stressed local and parental control of education decisions. Democrats said there was a pressing national need for brand–new federal involvement in generally local matters such as school construction and teacher hiring.

"The key to an era of excellence in American education is the empowerment of parents, school boards and communities," said Sen. John Ashcroft (R–Mo.), who pushed the testing amendment.

The amendment would prohibit voluntary national tests in reading and math unless specifically approved by Congress.

Friends of Jesus Christ condemn homosexuality

By Dylan Larke
Collegian Staff

The Friends of Jesus Christ religious group from Farmington, Maine distributed information yesterday condemning homosexuality from a table on the University of Massachusetts Campus Center concourse.

Anticipating the Friends of Jesus' return appearance from last spring, UMass Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender [GLBT] groups like the Stonewall Resource Center and the Pride Alliance staffed tables next to The Friends of Jesus table in protest and passed out information condoning homosexuality.

Religious group members Paula McCusker, James McCusker and Rachel Bell, who plan on returning to the concourse again today, distributed pamphlets titled "What's Wrong With Homosexuality" and "Straight Talk about Homosexuality." They also spoke with inquiring individuals and answered questions.

Junior biology major Katherine Rittgers, who questioned the legitimacy of the group, said, "I am here today because the Friends of Jesus were on campus last semester and their information seemed sketchy. For the first time in my life, I looked at the New Testament last night and it says that supposively it is a sin to judge and condemn others. I don't understand why they [Friends of Jesus] are here condemning homosexuality."

"Our information presents medical facts about homosexuality from different studies and psychological studies we have researched," Friends of Jesus member Paula McCusker said.

"The scriptures and the Bible states in black and white how homosexuality is a sin. God forbids all sex outside the heterosexual monogamous relationship. It makes me sad when I hear misinterpreted and twisted scriptures about affirming messages of homosexuality," McCusker said.

Physical therapy and exercise science major Cody Stewart believes differently.

"I feel that the Friends of Jesus are reading the Bible too literally. They misinterpret and twist the words around to the extreme," Stewart said.

"For the sake of the homosexual community and the general public, we are presenting what we consider to be the correct Christian response to inaccurate statements," McCusker said.

Amherst Brewing Company waits for ABCC's decision

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The Amherst Brewing Company is awaiting word on what action the Alcoholic Beverage Control Commission (ABCC) will take after ABCC officials found an underage female customer drinking there last Thursday night.

According to Brewing Company manager John Korpida, a female entered their establishment using false identification and later told the ABCC she didn't have any identification on her. It is illegal for police to forcibly search someone for their identification under such circumstances.

"This is our first infraction. We're pretty tough on underage drinkers," Korpida said. "We're trying to do all we can to keep them out — we've confiscated over 50 (fake) I.D.'s already."

This ABCC action comes close on the heels of a similar incident involving Pruddy's Latin American Restaurant, at 30 Boltwood Walk, and follows last year's charges against the Time Out Sports Bar, at 37 North Pleasant Street — both were found guilty by the ABCC of having minors drinking on their premises. Time Out was closed down as a result.

One problem these bars face is the constantly improving quality of false identification.

"The technology got so good, kids [made fake I.D.'s] in their dorm rooms," former Time Out owner Michael Fusila said. "Sometimes I couldn't tell that the kids had fakes."

Bar owners are also concerned with the lack of action that is taken against the underage drinkers.

"I lost a 21–year old business, 14 people lost jobs, customers lost a place to go," Fusia said. "Not one thing happened to the kids with the fake I.D.'s."

Korpida said he agrees with ABCC's policies and restrictions, because underage drinking is a problem, but thinks they come down too hard on the bars.

"They should probably do more to come down more on the people who are actually in possession of fake I.D.'s," Korpida said.

Korpida and Walker's Grill co–owner Brian Crawford both said they intend to prosecute underage drinkers found in their bars with trespassing, as a means of making them accountable for their actions.

"We are trying to find out who the minor that the ABCC found was, and we will press charges for trespassing, it will be our policy from now on," Korpida said. "We don't want to deal with this."

Crawford also felt prosecution

Author recounts her family's Jewish roots

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

Bringing a voice to the silence which filled her life, author Louise Kehoe spoke Tuesday night about her memoir, In This Dark House. Kehoe's presentation, entitled "Hide and Seek: Reclaiming Jewish Identity After the Holocaust" was part of Holocaust Memorial Week.

Kehoe wrote In This Dark House in 1995, after discovering that her father had been hiding his Jewish identity from his children. Kehoe's father made intense efforts to conceive a new identity for himself, making up a story to justify his Jewish–sounding name, Berthold Lubetkin, and telling his children that his parents had been killed in the Bolshevik Revolution. He refused to discuss his family or his past.

"One cannot take his identity and eradicate it without serious psychological consequences," Kehoe said.

Not only Lubetkin suffered as a result of his attempt to define himself; his children and wife paid a price as well.

"When people fail to hand on to their children a strong sense of Jewishness, what they end up handing

Zoll, UM celebrate

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Miriam Zoll, a University of Massachusetts graduate and co–founder of the national "Take Our Daughters to Work Day" campaign will be on campus today to celebrate UMass' fifth year of participation in the program.

In addition to observing first–hand the University's scheduled events for the campaign, Zoll will also present two lectures which are open to the public campus community.

Her first lecture, "Behind the Scenes of Take Our Daughters to Work," will be presented from 9:30–10 a.m. in the Green Room at the Mullins Center.

In her speech, Zoll will provide a historical overview about the founding of the program which is sponsored by the Ms. Foundation for Women; including the reasons for the programs creation and its impact on the modern U.S. women's movement and how it has affected young girls.

"Jonesboro, Guns, Girls and Boys: The Missing Link in the Newsroom," Zoll's second presentation will take place at 2:30 p.m. in Campus Center room 904–908.

In this talk, Zoll will focus on how traditional male gender roles influence boys' behavior and attitudes

SGA discusses HSCN, elections

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

It was announced last night at the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) meeting that cable channels for the Housing Services Cable Network (HSCN) would not be improved next year due to the fee freeze.

Senator Craig Cincotta (Sylvan At–Large) announced channels would not be added after attending an HSCN meeting last night concerning the channel lineup for next year.

"It's great that tuition is staying down and there's a fee freeze but if anything there is going to be worse channels. With no fees they have no money to pay for channels," Cincotta said. "With Bulger being solid on his no tuition, no fee increase, it's kind of hard for HSCN."

Cincotta said student requests for MTV and ESPN would not be able to be accommodated.

"ESPN. Definitely no. MTV. Never going to happen," Cincotta said. "ESPN went up 20 percent a month."

Women of Color program to hold three–day workshop

By Albertina Fernandes
Collegian Correspondent

The Women of Color program, a subsidiary of the Everywoman's Center (EWC), is preparing for their second annual Women of Color Institute three–day workshop.

The workshop will begin tomorrow at 7 a.m. in the Graduate Lounge of the Campus Center, and run through the weekend. The Women of Color Institute will consist of workshops, presentations and performances.

The Women of Color Institute decided to host a second conference due to the success of last year's event.

"We wanted to do something that brings women of color together," Director of Women of Color Lisa Scott said.

Speaking on "Sisterhood and Friendship: Moving from the Group to the Individual," opening ceremonies will begin with sociology professor Deirdre Royster.

The remainder of the three–day event will consist of an exhibition of original works by artists which reflect their culture and ethnicity. Women will illustrate their skills through dance, poetry, theatrical skits, song and music. Over 75 percent of the performances will be from women in the UMass community.

The difference between this year and last year's conference will be an honoring ceremony that will close the workshops to honor women of color on this campus.

The honoring ceremony will occur was the bars only means of recourse to deal with underage drinkers.

"We're not going to take it anymore, we'll give the police the I.D.'s, and then it's up to them to press charges," Crawford said. "We're trying to run a restaurant, and if a 20 -year old girl or guy comes in here people could lose their jobs, look at Time Out."

But Fusia said he did not want to press charges against the minors the ABCC found inside of Time Out.

"I could sue them but I'm not like that, I don't want to damage them like that," Fusia said. "I love UMass [University of Massachusetts] students, I made my living off them, but they have to realize what can happen when they break the law."

Another problem the bar owners and employees have is that out-of-state licenses are not legal identification with which to enter bars, according to Massachusetts state law.

Yet in a college town where approximately one-fifth of all bar customers are from out-of-state, not allowing out of state identification is not a feasible option for local bars. Many bars allow customers with out-of-state licenses in their bars at their own risk.

James Earl Ray said to be near death

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — James Earl Ray is in a coma, his kidneys have shut down and doctors have given the confessed assassin of Martin Luther King Jr. only days to live, his brother said yesterday.

Ray, 70, has been in critical condition since being taken to Nashville Memorial Hospital Monday, but officials there refuse to discuss his situation further.

"The doctor, he says it looks real bad," Jerry Ray said by telephone from his home in Smartt, Tenn. "He thinks it could be a few days." Jerry Ray said his brother has been in a coma since Tuesday morning and that doctors haven't been able to raise his blood pressure enough with medication to put Ray on dialysis.

Pam Hobbins, a spokeswoman for the state Department of Correction, declined to comment.

James Earl Ray suffers most notably from cirrhosis of the liver. He has been in and out of the hospital more than a dozen times since December 1996.

"The doctor says he's a cat with nine lives, but he seems to be using them up," Jerry Ray said.

James Earl Ray is serving a 99-year prison sentence for King's 1968 slaying. He confessed but has been trying ever since to recant and get a new trial.

The movie channel will be maintained but at a cost to quality.

"The Movie Channel will be something they're going to try to keep, but the quality of movies will go down," Cincotta said.

Cincotta said students would be receiving a Turner Broadcasting package.

"Things we pay for now are the Turner package. We might be dropping CNN and adding MSNBC instead," Cincotta said.

Two channels currently on HSCN will still be available next year.

"They're going to try to keep BET and Univision," Cincotta said.

Cincotta was pessimistic about the quality of cable channels for next year.

"As of now it doesn't look so hot for next year," Cincotta said.

In other announcements, acting president Peter Kilbourne said he is taking action so the upcoming SGA elections run smoothly.

"Every member of the Elections Commission will have a walkie-talkie so they can communicate between polling places. Commuter students will be able to vote at either polling place because they [polling place staff] can just call over to the other one and have them cross their name off the list. They [commuter students' polling places] won't have to have absentee ballots," Kilbourne said.

Kilbourne also said the Chancellor of Elections will be driving between polling places so he can open them on time.

The new SGA elections will be held April 29 and 30.

Senior Commencement Ball set

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The first annual 1998 Senior Commencement Ball will take place on May 22 in the Student Union as a way of kicking off the weekend before graduation.

The ball initiated as a co-effort by University of Massachusetts seniors and ball co-chairs Rob McDonald and Susanne Gurman in efforts to instill pride among the graduating seniors at the University.

Both students wanted to get the idea forward and received great support by chairpersons Susan Mattei and Ann Thompson from Alumni Relations.

"Our goal with this event is to start a new found tradition at the University that instills a love of alma mater," McDonald said.

Consuming the entire Student Union area, those in attendance will be treated with red carpeting extending from the steps of the Union as well as throughout the lobby areas. The lobby will be transformed into a park atmosphere complete with park benches, fountains, lamp posts, and the possibility of being invited for a moonlight ride in a horse- drawn carriage.

Nikki Stoia from the music department will be featured on the piano in the Cape Cod Lounge. Other guests include a cappella groups Doo Wop Shop and Six Minutes, as well as a Boston College D.J. from All-Star Productions.

In addition, the Student Union Ballroom will be transformed into a buffet-style dinner with carving stations, vegetarian entrees, and passed hors d'oeuvres. A social hour will occur around noon where coupons will be given out for two free drinks (with valid I.D.) to those present. As well as an exhibition of senior art work, there will be three bars sampling exquisite foods such as wine and cheese.

Tickets are $25 dollars per person and can be purchased on the Campus Center concourse until Friday, April 24, or by stopping by Alumni Relations in Memorial Hall or calling 545-2317 after the 24th.

Seniors can bring as many guests as they choose from all undergraduate levels and different schools.

As Gurman said, "as the first Commencement Ball at UMass, we would like to see this be a successful evening of friends celebraing their final nights together In memory of their experiences at UMass."

Sex offender won't walk free, judge rules

By Martin Finucane
Associated Press

BOSTON — A convicted child rapist won't walk free from the state's treatment center for sex offenders — at least not while an appeal is conducted in his case, a judge ruled yesterday.

Massachusetts Appeals Court Justice Frederick Brown ruled that Frederick Wyatt's case was "worthy of appellate review" and blocked a lower court's order releasing him.

A Superior Court jury two weeks ago ordered the 47-year-old Wyatt freed from the state's Treatment Center for the Sexually Dangerous in Bridgewater, where he has served for 15 years under a civil commitment.

The commitment could have kept him there for life.

But under a new law passed four years ago, sex offenders can try to show a jury that they are no longer sexually dangerous and deserve release. Wyatt's case is the first instance in which a jury has decided to let someone go.

A lawyer for the state told Brown yesterday that Superior Court Judge David Brady had made a mistake when instructing the jury that decided to free Wyatt.

Mary Murray, representing the Department of Correction, argued that Brady incorrectly told the jury that there was a legal presumption that Wyatt was not sexually dangerous.

There is no such presumption, she said.

Wyatt's lawyer, John Swomley, said the law requires that Wyatt's dangerousness be proven beyond a reasonable doubt "and that means he has to be given the presumption of being not sexually dangerous."

Wyatt should be able to start the hearing "at ground zero as being entitled to belong in society," rather than with a strike against him, Swomley said.

Both Murray and Swomley were peppered with questions by Brown, who released his decision on paper about an hour later.

The judge ordered briefs to be filed by June 10 and scheduled oral arguments for sometime in June.

Brown, who expressed concern during the hearing that Wyatt might be held just because of delays in legal paperwork, warned, "No enlargements or continuances will be granted, nor should any be sought."

on is a hybrid of self-hatred," Kehoe said. "I felt as though a gigantic part of myself had been mysteriously removed."

Kehoe described her childhood in rural England as "dysfunctional," and her confusion was not without reason. In England, church and state are inevitably inseparable. Kehoe went to school and learned religion, only to return home and be indoctrinated in the ways of atheism and Communism.

Conversely, Kehoe's father left clues to lead his family to discover his Jewish identity. He routinely took the family on trips to Europe to visit Holocaust landmarks, although the education Kehoe and her siblings received about the Holocaust explained the time period as one of extreme nationalism and scapegoating.

"It was a backhanded, surrogate way of telling us the truth," Kehoe said.

Kehoe discovered the final clues which would lead her to understanding her father's identity on her own. After his death, while going through his closet, Kehoe came upon a postcard addressed to her father concerning his parents. The postcard was written in 1940, and stated that Lubetkin's parents were living in Warsaw. They were living in the kitchen of their house, the writer of the postcard explained, because the rest of the house had been burned down by Nazis.

Kehoe also found an address book with the phone number and address of a cousin of her father's living in Brooklyn. Kehoe made arrangements to meet with the woman to learn more about Lubetkin.

Kehoe learned that her father had abandoned his parents and removed himself in all ways possible from his Jewish roots. Despite what her father had told her to the contrary, his name was Berthold Lubetkin.

At 40, Kehoe began the process of converting to Judaism. She wrote her book soon after her conversion.

"The book is about what it means to disavow one's Jewishness and what it means to reclaim it," said Kehoe. "It is not a chronicle of victimology, but a journey to discovery."

Amherst College to host storytelling fest

By Meher Singh
Collegian Staff

"Keepers of the Word," the sixth-annual storytelling festival held at Amherst College, is being held this Saturday, April 25.

Amherst College Associate Dean Jean Moss is the creative genius behind the festival. She wants it to be an inter- generational event for all ages. According to Moss, "I went to a small storytelling festival and I was amazed at how beautiful it was, and I wanted to try it myself."

Moss has attended numerous storytelling festivals and conferences, national and regional, which have given her ideas for "Keepers of the Word." She says that a critical factor involved in deciding who the storytellers will be is to determine who the audience is, as a crucial aspect in effective storytelling is for the storytellers to relate to the students.

"Putting together a performance is similar to putting together a jazz ensemble. Someone is percussion, someone is flute, someone is poetry, and someone is melody," Moss said. Put together, these textures become the whole performance.

Moss wanted to bring in storytellers that reflected the major student communities on campus. This included the Asian, African, and Hispanic communities amongst others. "I wanted an ensemble of storytellers... when you look up on the stage, the storyteller would be reflective, to some degree, to your own background," Moss said.

The name "Keepers of the Word" is taken from a book entitled "Bury My Bones and Keep My Words." Indeed, storytellers are keepers of the word, preserving tradition and memories, a concept dating back in African heritage. "A community-sensitive storyteller is not one who sits at a desk, but one who listens to the people," Moss said. This year's storytellers include Moss, whose stories come from Africa as well as around the world. She tells stories relating to a variety of topics, including praise, trickery, and liberation.

Another storyteller is a duo who call themselves "The Storycrafters." They are internationally-known storytellers, famous for incorporating ethnic and classical musical instruments into their stories.

The third storyteller is a ninth-grader from Louisiana named Zane Victorian, who has been storytelling since third grade. Victorian has performed at schools, libraries, conferences and several festivals and is the youngest member of the group.

Tejumola "Teju" Ologboni is the fourth storyteller, an internationally-renowned storyteller from Wisconsin. Teju uses gestures and movements to tell his stories, focusing on traditional African tales.

The final two storytellers are Geri Keams and Clara Yen. Keams is famous for sharing her stories of the Navajo, and has been a featured storyteller at the Kennedy Center and Smithsonian Institute, Washington D.C.

Clara Yen is a young woman from California with a Chinese background, which is the basis of many of her tales. Yen has performed on television and in numerous West Coast conferences, and has conducted several storytelling workshops.

on Sunday, beginning at 11:00 a.m. and will include ritual and dance performances led by women of color bringing the weekends events to a close. Brunch will be served.

Saturday's keynote speaker, Xiaojiang Zhao said, "I'm no expert, but I just came here to speak as a survivor." Zhao will be touching upon health issues concerning women of color.

Most of the performers and attendee's will be from the UMass campus with a few from other Four Colleges. Registration through the Women of Color Institute is required for the three-day event for those who are interested.

The Quote Board

Dear Fans: Luke would like you to know that he is really, really, really sorry he didn't write last week, but frankly, the kid had nothing to say. Nothing. I mean, absolutely nothing. Even more so than usual.

Luke apologizes, and promises never to miss a Thursday again. At least the two left, anyways.

Luke's No.1 Fan,
Maggie Seaver

Hmm. Thanks Mags. I knew I could count on you. In fact, I'm dedicating this one to you, Mags.

You go, girl.

On September 15th, 1996, a month after moving into Mill Valley, Housemate B said something outrageous, like he'll do sometimes. (He once got mad and told me to go to the Collegian, bunk some beds and live there).

Luke Meredith

Hmm. I'd save on rent, at least.

But this time, we put his ramblings to paper. Two years later, that bulletin board has become the "Quote Board," and there are so many rumpled Post-It's, Hu-Ke-Lau napkins, and other crap that it's spilling onto the floor.

Well, we're all out of here pretty soon. The girls taking over our lease already brought a mom over to measure rooms for their furniture. My idea with Housemate A to turn the house into a museum probably won't happen, so the only real evidence of "The Mill Valley Years: 1996–1998" is this bulletin board covered in Post-It's, Hu-Ke-Lau napkins and Knick City Dancers team photos.

We need our places in history secured. And since the museum is out ("The Man" doesn't seem to think it's a good idea), I figure I'll write a column about it. At least this way, it's legacy will remain, albeit on microfiche in the library.

The board itself? We'll figure that out later.

The Quote Board had rules. They were:

1) Had to be spontaneous, heartfelt, and somewhat serious.

2) Had to be said in the house.

3) Couldn't get any of us in trouble with our girlfriends.

Here are some of the better ones.

January 29, 1997, Luke. Subject: Academics— "My professor today called the Industrial Revolution a 'veritable orgy of conceptual realism.' At that point, I dropped the class."

March 28, 1998, Teddy. Subject: Western Massachusetts values— "If I won $50,000, I'd spend it on prostitutes, CD's and Sega games."

Spring 1997, Anonymous. Subject: Vices— "Two questions. One, advice on how to roll a blunt. Two, did I get my bet in?"

Date unknown, Anonymous. Subject: Philosophy— "I like to mix it up. Sometimes I tell the truth, sometimes I lie."

Fall 1996, Anonymous. Subject: Dating— "Look, I'm 20 years old. I'm not playing games right now."

March 24, 1997, P.J. Subject: $600 dental bill for Tooth #23— "$600? They might as well ask for $5,000."

March 29, 1997, B. Subject: Intoxicating minors.

"I don't really like beer," said girl.

"We have vodka...," said B.

October 15, 1997, A and C. Subject: A in crisis.

"I think I should get Luke's opinion," said A.

"Why," said C. "That's like asking the Pope about Chanukah."

September 29, 1997. Homecoming. Approximately 11:30 p.m. Bouncer uptown. Subject: Underage drinking.

"Under normal circumstances, no way (would I take this ID). But tonight's a special occasion."

September 29, 1997. Homecoming. Approximately 11:40 p.m. Garv. Subject: Dating.

"You graduated UMass in 1994? I was a junior in high school. I gotta go."

There are others, far more vulgar, far more random. You'd either would not get them, or I'd be arrested.

Then A and I would each have jail time under our belts. (Long story).

But if you're curious about the rest, the Quote Board will be on display until May 24, 1998 in our palatial Mill Valley estate.

Better act quick. I hear microfiche is a bitch to read.

Letters to the Editor

U.S. delinquent with U.N. dues

To the editor:

A recurring hobby on Capitol Hill has been to bash the United Nations. Inside the beltway, politicians wearing five- hundred-dollar suits, line up to take a shot at hitting the target, Secretary General Kofi Annan sitting on the edge of a plank over a barrel of water.

The United States is already in delinquency on its back dues, roughly $1.5 billion and a default would mean actually being expelled from the U.N.

Can you imagine the spectacle of those proceedings? Unthinkable? No, not really, since powerful conservatives in Congress such as Trent Lott (R–Miss.) and Jesse Helms (R–NC), would prefer this scenario.

Why? Essentially because they are unilateralists, meaning they believe the U.S., being the sole superpower left in the world, need not reach consensus with other nations on how to resolve conflict or if its "national interests" were threatened.

In other words, they don't want their hands tied.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott went so far as to say that "Clinton had subcontracted U.S. foreign policy out to the U.N.," when referring to Annan's negotiated settlement with Iraq over weapons inspections. He even refused to meet with Annan when the Secretary General came to Washington to brief Congress on the accord.

Helms, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee chair, ratified that the peaceful resolution to the brinkmanship was a "disgrace."

As a founding member of the U.N. and by being a permanent member of the Security Council, if the U.S. does not pay its back dues, it will also lose its tremendously powerful veto as a result of its expulsion.

It is a struggle between the multilateralists, who believe the U.S. should try to reach consensus and negotiated agreement on questions involving issues of war and peace and the unilateralists like Mr. Lott and Mr. Helms, who would have the U.S. alone in the world, the despised international policeman, powerful but isolated.

This is a prescription for disaster and a pill Americans should not swallow.

Doonesbury BY GARRY TRUDEAU

I'm gonna live forever

An alcoholic would call it a "moment of clarity" — that precise pinpoint moment in one's life when everything takes on a high definition glaze and seems to fall into place. I guess I was ripe for one. I'm going into my second semester of my junior year here at UMass and "real life" is just around the corner. It's hard to list skills like knowing way too much about obscure '80s sitcoms like "She's the Sheriff" and "That's My Momma" on a resumé and be taken seriously. I needed direction in my life, if only to settle Ma and Pa Messaros' fears about where exactly all the money's going. All the ingredients were there for a moment such as the one I had. Now all I needed was the catalyst.

Mike Messaros

I remember it as if it were yesterday. I'm lying in bed at two in the morning watching "The Daily Show" (I need direction in my life? — No!) and the guest was Jim Bruer, from "Saturday Night Live" and the movie Half–Baked. At approximately 2:18 a.m. on Wednesday, January 28, 1998, Jim proceeded to make sweet love with the anchor's desk.

And so it began. New levels of understanding were unfolding before my eyes. I was having my moment of clarity: I'd become famous.

No, really. Jim Bruer gave me the confidence to do this, to follow my brand new dream. I mean, here's a guy who has seemingly built if not his whole act, at least a good portion of it, on the fact that he has droopy eyelids, and this gives him the appearance of being perpetually high. That's the whole story.

So why can't I do this? Why can't I be famous for no good reason? There are enough people that seemingly have no place in this society, but are still famous for one reason or another. I could show up as a guest on a talk show or a game show and people would just accept it, much like Dr. Joyce Brothers, or Charo. "Oh, Mike's on Hollywood Squares again...," and people would just eat it up, me and my famous antics.

But I need a gimmick. I figure that the droopy eyelids thing has already been done, so I have to think of something equally, if not more, groundbreaking, if at all possible. I figure the way I'll go is not wear a belt.

But you may say to yourself, "Mike, I don't wear a belt, and I'm not famous." Ah, there's the rub. Wearing a belt or not wearing a belt does not warrant fame in and of itself. There must be something else. What I'm going to do is wear pants that are too big for my waist. That way everytime I stand up... my pants fall down! People will be sitting at home watching me on whatever program and they'll say, "I sure hope Mike remembered his belt..."

I'll slowly stand up. The pants start to slip..." Uh–oh! He forgot his belt. Those pants are comin' down!"

Then as my pants will collapse around my knees, the home audience will say, "Oh Mike — will you ever learn?"

But it's not just about my pants falling down; there will be all kinds of subtext and undercurrent, much like fine drama. For example, what kind of underwear will I be wearing? And there's always the one thing that will keep them glued to their sets: what if I forget to wear my underwear?

But this is all short term. I realize people may grow tired of my routine. That's when I'll try, unsuccessfully, to branch out into serious drama. After this fails, I may star in some "erotic thrillers," as they are labelled at Blockbuster, where whole new levels will be explored from my pants falling down. I may fade away after a bit. Then after a bit, nostalgia will set in. All the hip young kids will decide it's cutting edge to like me, just like horn–rimmed glasses and shoulder bags, and I will be introduced to a whole new generation. I will be reborn.

But alas, I'll meet an untimely and strange end. Millions will watch my funeral on TV and I will be eulogized by contemporaries as "an underappreciated genius" who was "more than willing to laugh at himself." Ironically, I will be buried with a belt and pants that fit.

So catch me while you can, kiddies, I'm a shiny, rising star. Or maybe just the best read bum on the block.

ed/op is looking for new writers!

The Ed/Op desk is currently seeking new columnists. The way to get involved is by submitting pieces for us to consider publishing. They should be 600–800 words long, well–written, and have a point. There are no restrictions on topics, but we are especially interested in pieces on campus politics, satire, and work that takes an unexpected perspective.

Editorials can be submitted by e–mailing letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu or in person to the Collegian offices in the Campus Center basement.

Sonic Youth to play Northampton

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

Sonic Youth stand as one of the most unlikely success stories of underground American rock. While early contemporaries R.E.M. and Hüsker Dü were both fairly conventional in their song structures, Sonic Youth began their career by completely abandoning any pretense of traditional rock 'n roll conventions.

Borrowing heavily from the free-form noise experimentalism of the Velvet Underground and the Stooges, and melding it with a performance-art aesthetic copped from the New York post-punk avant garde scene of the late '70s, Sonic Youth redefined what noise meant in rock 'n roll. Simply put, they represented the antithesis of rock.

As evidenced by their series of instrumental EP's on their homegrown label, SYR, released last year and the forthcoming A Thousand Leaves album (in stores on May 12), their inscrutable knack for improvisation and innovation remains intact.

In advance of the album's release, tomorrow night's show at John M. Greene Hall in Northampton marks a homecoming of sorts for Thurston Moore and wife Kim Gordon, who along with their daughter, Coco, call the Pioneer Valley home.

While the band spent much of the '80s endlessly touring the world, their touring schedule has slowed considerably due to the constraints of domestic life on all four of the group's members. The show is Sonic Youth's first in the Valley in nearly three years and their only New England date this spring.

After Nirvana ushered the underground into the mainstream in the fall of 1990, Sonic Youth scored a modest hit with "Kool Thing" and saw their major label debut, Goo, crack the Top 100. Neil Young even invited Sonic Youth to open for him on his arena tour for Ragged Glory. The pop breakthrough never came, however.

Now free of the constraints of ever becoming too commercial, Sonic Youth have made a headlong return towards the most diskomant of rock with A Thousand Leaves. The majority of the album's songs are sprawling canvasses onto which shards of guitar noise permeate through rumbling bass lines which stretch over five minutes in length. "Hits of Sunshine" is a touching tribute to the enduring punk spirit of beat poet Allen Ginsburg who obviously influenced the band over the years.

Sonic Youth perform at John M. Greene Hall at Smith College tomorrow night at 8 p.m. Tickets are $15.50 and can be purchased from Tix Unlimited in the Student Union, For The Record in Amherst, B-Side Records in Northampton or by calling (413) 732-0202. The show is all ages.

in 1657 the first chocolate tavern opened in London, and the drink eventually became available to the masses.

At the end of the 1600s, Frenchman David Chaillon discovered how to evaporate the liquid in chocolate and mold it into solids. Louis XIV appointed Chaillon Royal Chocolate Maker to the King and he enjoyed a 23-year monopoly on French chocolate sales.

Chocolate plants spread across Europe in the 18th century, and Dr. James Baker opened the first American chocolate plant in 1765. Baker marketed his chocolate as a cure for many ailments, including impotency.

Today chocolate is grown all over the tropical world, including South and Central America, Asia, Africa and Australia.

Many of its aphrodisiac qualities remain intuitive — its creamy texture, mouth-watering scent and delicious flavor among them.

According to writer Chris Savage King, "The giving of chocolate carries with it an assumption of expectation in intimacy. It is to melt in the mouth of the recipient, and intoxicate the senses."

Modern scientists, however, have also found a chemical basis for chocolate's stimulating effects.

Eating chocolate releases phenylethylamine, an anti- depressant which stimulates the brain and creates a sense of euphoria similar to that of being in love.

Not convinced yet? Then check out some of the rich recipes Intercourses: An Aphrodisiac Cookbook written by Martha Hopkins and Rendell Lockridge with illustrated instructions for sensuous meals and deserts.

Love by Chocolate, written by Roseanne Bittner, combines chocolate recipes with romantic love stories and is another good choice.

For the more daring (or kitchen-phobic?), chocolate body paint is a playful and intimate option.

But whatever your tastes, chocolate is truly an affair to remember.

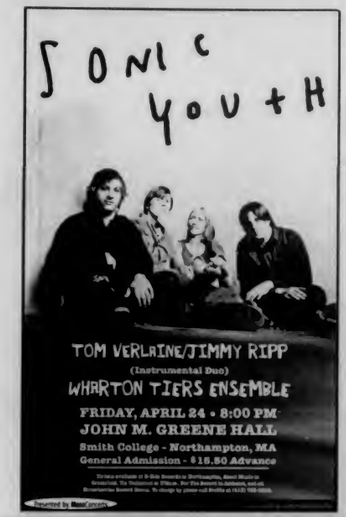
Joshua Redman Quartet mesmerizes Iron Horse with sheer virtuosity

By Joe Sullivan
Collegian Staff

JOSHUA REDMAN QUARTET
Iron Horse Music Hall
April 21

NORTHAMPTON — On Tuesday night at the Ironhorse, the Joshua Redman Quartet played everything from Bob Dylan to Ira Gershwin in a set that left the crowd mesmerized by the group's sheer virtuosity.

Debuting in 1993 with the Grammy–nominated Joshua Redman, and since releasing Wish, Moodswing and Spirit Of The Moment, Redman has been heralded as the jazz world's newest saxophone phenom. His performance last night lived up to the hype and then some.



Taking the stage alongside drummer Greg Hutchinson, bass player Larry Guinevere, and pianist Brad Mehldau, Redman wore a big grin as he steered the group through the opener, "Blues On Sunday." Playing around with a lot of stop–and–go action, some dizzying sax solos that featured high octave tripple–tonguing, and high energy soloing from Mehldau and Guinevere, the group seemed to stun the packed house into awestruck adulation.

Not stopping for a second, the group hurried into Gershwin's, "Summertime," which saw a gyrating Redman open with whining effects, and a stoic Hutchinson bust out a searing drum solo. Redman alerted the audience that this was actually Hutchinson's first time playing with the group, but by the drummer's scorching fills and unbelievable work with the cymbals, it seemed far–fetched.

The third offering, "Sweet Sorrow," slowed things down a bit before Redman put down his tenor and picked up an alto for a rendition of Bob Dylan's "The Times They Are A–Changin'" that was not quite how Dylan had composed it, but was still outstanding. At the close of the '60s classic, Redman told the crowd that it had just been recorded for inclusion on an upcoming album.

After picking up his tenor again, Redman surprised and wowed the crowd again with another piece not usually heard at most jazz shows: Prince's, "How Come You Don't Call Me Anymore," featured a Guinevere bass line, the hipness of which has not been heard around

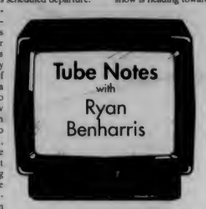
Best & worst of 1997–98 television season

After a season of some stupendous hits and embarrassing misses, it's time to reflect on a year in television that is currently in the process of coming to an end. We've seen many unexpected events, and some of the same old routines that we may never get to see again. The 1997-98 season of TV is the year that one of the greatest shows in history, "Seinfeld," says goodbye.



However, this season has brought some terrific new entertainment that could soon become an heir to "Seinfeld," which has been the king of television throughout the '90s. We've said hello and goodbye to familiar faces, and we've entered new personalities into our lives. So here's a breakdown using categories of all of the important aspects of television in the past year.

Best New Show — This category was extremely difficult to choose a winner. After careful reasoning, I would have to say that "Ally McBeal" is a winner here. Definitely, consideration went to WB's newest and best drama, "Dawson's Creek." However, "Ally McBeal" has proven to have the ability to gain a huge audience (not that "Dawson's Creek" doesn't) and promises to be mega hit in the future.

Biggest Flop — "Significant Others." If a show is placed into the time slot as a great show such as "Party of Five," it shouldn't be taken off the air two weeks before its scheduled departure.

Best Re-emergence — This award was designed for N B C ' s "Saturday Night Live." If you have had a chance to watch the show that has been run for so many years, you will realize that the cast and everything else about the show has gotten better than it has been in years. The show had a complete revamping this past summer, and even after the termination of Norm MacDonald half way through the season, "SNL" has had a great year.

Biggest Ratings Diver — Remember all the hype that surrounded Brooke Shields' "Suddenly Susan" last year? it was placed in the 8:30 p.m. time slot that followed NBC's "Friends," and was gaining a lot of ratings. Unfortunately, after being moved to Monday nights, Shields has been unable to retain her viewers, and the show is heading towards the basement.

Best Possible Season Finale (Excluding "Seinfeld," since it has a series finale coming up) — Like it always does, "Friends" promises to have a great season finale. After proposing to his British girlfriend, Ross (David Schwimmer) plans to be the center of a Friends wedding. However, since this show has become so predictable, and has been solely based on the relationship between Ross and Rachel (Jennifer Aniston) in the past, I can pretty much assure you that the "Friends" season finale will have a great possibility of confrontation between these two central characters.

The Losing Its Charm Award — "Friends" takes back to back awards here. The show just isn't that funny anymore. I have seen every episode, and I still remember how hilarious the show was in its first season. "Friends" has to do something to fix its major plot problems in order to regain its original hilarity. Let's look at what the show's basic promise entails. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out where the lack of humor comes from when every week Jennifer Aniston, Courtney Cox, Matthew Perry and Matt LeBlanc moan about not being able to find dates. Someone correct me here, but I'm pretty sure that none of these four people even know what the word "single" means.

Best Cliffhanger Ending — Who's Cartman's father? If I hear that question one more time, I'm going to go crazy. The creators of "South Park" did an excellent job with their season finale a few months ago, and it deservingly receives this award.

Worst Attempt to Gain an Audience — What were you watching at half-time of the Super Bowl this year? If you were as unfortunate as me, you were watching that awful "Celebrity Death Match" that MTV hosted. If you missed this, it contained three fights that were clay animated.

John Hurt, Jason Priestley star in whimsical comedy

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

LOVE AND DEATH ON LONG ISLAND
Directed by Richard Kwietniowski with John Hurt, Jason Priestley, Fiona Loewi
Playing at The Academy of Music (Northampton)

"Like all stories, this one begins with another," introduces the narrator as dream-like images of a young man, his dog and the ocean materialize on screen. The voice belongs to Giles De'Ath, a dusty old British writer who lives in his own world of fountain pens, afternoon tea and the books of E.M. Forster. As played by John Hurt, in what is maybe the finest of performance of his impeccable career, Giles is an intelligent but lonely professor-type who is completely out of touch with the 20th century — he can't tell the difference between a microwave and a VCR. Too bad he isn't American, we could have used him on the O.J. jury.

The film, Love and Death on Long Island, is a whimsical, brilliantly droll comedy which somehow manages to retain its dry humor while still covering rich subjects like old versus new. British-American culture clashes and art versus guilty pleasure.

One day, our tragic anti-hero Giles is locked out of his stuffy home in the middle of a dreary rainstorm. Finding shelter in a local movie theater, he buys a ticket to what he thinks is an adaption of Forster, but instead is a co-ed American romp in the mold of Meatballs and Porky's called "Hotpants College II." Giles is, of course, appalled. "This isn't E. M. Forster!," he exclaims with naive indignation.

Giles is about to leave the theater when he catches the entrance of a bright-eyed actor named Ronnie Bostock (Jason Priestley). Ronnie, with his pretty boy face and smile, has that immaculate beauty that makes Leonardo DiCaprio the current object of fantastical affection.

With the camera both cautious and economical, Giles stares at Ronnie's image on the screen. It's love at first sight. Love and Death on Long Island is a tale of infatuation, but it's all done in an airy, delightful manner, and Hurt's non-sexual approach (the film makes a point of Giles having a deceased wife) allows the movie to be one of those Smile Comedies, find out the consistency you desire, and experiment with a different pint of strawberries (practice makes perfect!).

3) Hold the strawberry inside the stem, and dip into the melted chocolate (for cherries, by the stem, and for oranges, at either end of the slice). Then, take the strawberry and place it on the cookie sheet lined with wax paper.

4) Do that for all of the strawberries, and place the cookie sheet into the refrigerator or freezer (all matters on how impatient you are to start shoving them down your throat).

• This other recipe is for the experts out there. It is not easy, and it combines a lot of different disciplines, and you need to have a very creative eye.

Truthfully, I was scared when I first made this, and my mother was a pastry chef (an incredible one, at that). The Finnish Kitchen wouldn't be anything without her.

Chocolate-Hazelnut Torte (preheat oven to 375 degrees)

Equipment needed: double boiler, 9-inch cake tin, baking parchment, spatula, whisk and (a very sharp) knife. Ingredients: 11 oz. plain chocolate, broken into squares; 4 tbsp. liqueur (either Frangelico or Chambord); 6 oz. unsalted butter; 3 eggs, separated; 5 oz. caster (fine grade) sugar; 3 oz. ground toasted hazelnuts (save some whole hazelnuts for decoration); 2 oz. self-raising flour.

First, the torte:

1) Melt 7 oz. of the chocolate with 4 oz. of the unsalted butter and 3 tbsp. of the liqueur (see previous recipe).

2) Whisk egg yolks with sugar until pale and thick, then stir into chocolate mixture. Fold in nuts and flour.

3) Whisk egg whites with salt until stiff, then fold into chocolate mixture. Pour mixture into cake tin lined with baking parchment (this is an art in itself, and make sure the parchment is tight with the edges of the cake tin), and bake for 45–50 minutes until firm to touch.

4) Cool for five minutes, and then turn on to wire rack.

Second, the glaze:

1) Melt 4 oz. of the chocolate with 2 oz. of the unsalted butter and 1 tbsp. of the liqueur (see previous recipe).

2) Cool until it begins to thicken, then spread over the cake and down the sides.

• Here's the difficult part. If you are able to spin through this web of rhetoric, you deserve a medal. Making a single layer cake and the glaze (i.e. frosting) is the easy part to this recipe, but the decoration is the artistic part.

To do the true torte, you have to first double the cake recipe, and then get the (very sharp) knife out. When both cakes cool, choose the bottom half (It doesn't matter which one) and slice from the bottom edge inward at an upward angle around the cake.

Turn over the top half on to a plate, and lightly frost the bottom half. Place the top half on to the bottom half, and press down until the frosting leaks out the edge.

Lightly frost the top of the bottom half, and after doing the same delicate operation for the top half of the torte, place that on top of the bottom half in true double-layer torte fashion. Then, do Step 2 in the glaze directions.

3) Take the whole hazelnuts, pick out the best, and decorate the top of the torte (around the edge) according to how many slices you want (i.e. 12 hazelnuts for 12 slices).

Good luck, and don't gain too much weight in all of the experimentation. Hey, but still live a little.

the ones that aren't laugh-out-loud funny, but are so dryly witty that a big grin becomes permanently stuck on your face.

Like any obsessed fan, Giles gathers all there is to know about Ronnie, from his pictures in "Teenbeat"-like magazines to his love for Stephen King and Guns and Roses. But it's funny because Giles is dignified — he pastes everything into a scrap book labeled "Bostockiana," and gives professional lectures on "The Death of the Future" which end up digressing into musings on Bostock's smile.

This first half of the film is written and directed by Richard Kwietnioski in such a perfectly assured style that almost inevitably, the movie suffers when Giles journeys to Long Island, where he finally meets Ronnie. But previous to that, it's superb fun seeing Giles discover technology as he discovers Ronnie. The old man still calls movies "the pictures," and you can imagine the look on the delivery boy's face when Giles orders a VCR without buying a TV first.

The plot begins to take more shape — thus losing some of the fun — in the Long Island scenes, as Giles uses his charisma and stature to become friends with Ronnie and his supermodel, super-friendly wife Audrey (a lovely Fiona Loewi), thus integrating his personality with the two young lovers. Audrey — like the audience — is quite smitten with the old man, but Ronnie is a bit more skeptical. He can't believe when Giles suggest that if Shakespeare was alive today, he'd be making "Hotpants College III."

It's important to note that Giles isn't sick in the head — he just thinks Ronnie is a gifted actor, way past the material given to him. Rather than this be a disturbing look at the disturbing subject of celebrity obsession, then, Love and Death in Long Island is more a study of a person looking for artistic and personal inspiration, which is of course hilarious to us because that source here is Jason Priestley.

Doing a delicious variation of his "Beverly Hills, 90210" persona, Priestley gives Ronnie a distant, naive energy that perfectly captures the American youthfulness of Giles' desire.

But it's Hurt — a sweet mix of child-like enthusiasm and fatherly poignancy — that gives Love and Death on Long Island its charm. You feel bad for Giles in his attempt to persuade Ronnie to make good "art" films. Unlike many Hollywood movies, director Kwietnioski actually deals with issues instead of skirting around them with a joke or four- hanky scene.

Love and Death is no masterpiece, but it sometimes invokes such merits, as Giles has discovered beauty "where no one has ever thought of looking for it." But will Ronnie? The film seems to reach an intriguing compromise — Ronnie is still content to star in "Hotpants College III," but thanks to Giles, he's improvising a scene with the poetry of Walt Whitman, who wrote about finding oneself better than most. and were fights to the death. The three matches were: Howard Stern vs. Kathy Lee Gifford, Pamela Lee vs. RuPaul, and Hanson vs. The Spice Girls. All three were completely stupid, and a complete waste of time. The only reason MTV had this terrible special was to gain bragging rights that they pulled people away from the Super Bowl. Let's just hope that in 1999, there won't be a "Celebrity Death Match 2."

Most Anticipated Moment of Any Show — Wait! Before you yell out, "Who is Cartman's father?" I want to bring up another question that you may have forgotten. Is Charlie going to die? Remember the hype surrounding the season finale of "Party of Five"? If you missed it, one of the lead characters, Charlie, received the news from his doctor that he was going to survive his Hodgkin's disease. I still remember the tingles in my body, and the near tears in my eyes when he shouted in joy with the phone in his had. This feeling alone gives "Party of Five" the most anticipated moment award.

The "C'ya, Wouldn't Wanna Be Ya Award" — This award goes to the most important people that we won't be seeing on television anymore because of a stupid reason. I couldn't decide who would win this so it's a tie between Frank Gifford and Marv Albert. Gifford will no longer be seen in the commentary booths during "Monday Night Football," and Albert is gone from the "NBA on NBC." Sorry boys, but If you can't play nice, you can't play at all.

Lifetime Achievement Award — This Sunday, "The Simpsons" will broadcast its 200th episode. The creators of the great show get this award for their years of hard work.

Best Variety Series — "The Daily Show" is a gem for Comedy Central. Craig Kilborne is born to host the news and be funny as he proved on ESPN's "SportsCenter" for years. This show is by far the best variety show on television.

Best Drama Series — Once again, "Party of Five" grabs another award. Look for it to have a strong pulling at September's Emmy Awards for this category also.

Best Comedy Series — As I have mentioned in the past, I'm not a big fan, but I have to give it props. "Seinfeld" will leave with a bang this year and is by far the funniest show on TV.

Most Memorable Moment of the Year — It hasn't happened yet, but I'm sure that there will be nothing this year that will top the last five minutes of the two hour series finale of "Seinfeld." This will be what TV viewers around the world will remember in their hearts about the 1997-1998 season forever.

these parts since Billy Taylor played Bowker with Chip Jackson in tow, as well as the type of all-around rock 'n roll funk-fused theatrics for which Prince and his alter ego are well known.

The group closed the main set with the funky Jerome Curran composition, "Yesterdays," really showing what Mehldau could do on the piano. The quartet returned for an encore set with Redman session-player, Brian Blade, reprising his role as main man on drums.

Overall, Redman and his quartet tore up the Iron Horse. The band was very tight, but at the same time showed the capacity to go wild when they needed to in a high-powered but also highly disciplined display of prowess.

Solex's debut album cohesive, Pete Droge ordinary & depressing

SOLEX VS. THE HITMEISTER
Solex
Matador

There are three things I know for sure when it comes to music: 1) Redheads should never be allowed to go to indie rock shows specifically to pick up indie rock guys; 2) The Bangles were at their best when Susanna Hoffs was front and center and 3) Matador is one of the most trustworthy labels in the world. Trustworthy like a boy scout, Matador has turned out some of great albums over the years, from Superchunk to Liz Phair, Pavement to Yo La Tengo.

So from this grand stable of artists comes the debut album from Elizabeth Esselink, known here as Solex. Solex was signed based on the strength of an unsolicited demo. She's in good company in that regard: Liz Phair was the last to be discovered that way.

This album is strange, to say the least. Solex's sound is slightly creepy, a lighter version of Portishead. The album has an ambient feel to it, relaxing while at the same time hinting at threatening. Beats skitter across the sonic landscape while Solex breathes her lyrics softly over them. The album is cohesive, if not inspired. Songs drift into songs and you can find yourself lost. It's not necessarily a bad thing.

While not on par with a lot of the other bands on Matador, Solex does offer promise. The worst thing I can say about this album is that she had the annoying idea that including "Solex" in every title of every track would be cute. But if that's the worst thing you have going for you, then you're off to a good start. Hopefully her next album will expand on her ambient visions and give us a new classic from an already impressive label's catalog. B (Mike Messaros)

SKULL ORCHARD
Jon Langford
Sugarfree

For the past 20 years Jon Langford has been the ferocious heart and soul of art-punk geniuses The Mekons, rowdy twang rockers The Waco Brothers, and countless other side projects. Only now, though, has Langford seen fit to step forward and deliver his first solo album, the thoroughly engaging and dynamic Skull Orchard.

So why the long wait? The answer lies in the songs themselves. Skull Orchard is a concept album of sorts — an album that looks back to Langford's Welsh home and lays it all out for a thorough, and unforgiving, appraisal. Perhaps it was necessary, then, for Langford to step out of the shadows of his bandmates and paint such a brutal, personal portrait of his childhood home.

This isn't a happily-ever-after seaside town story, however. This is a heartbreaking look at the decay and lost hope of a community drowning in hardship. Unemployment, personal frustration, pollution and even the bitter irony of having the film production of Moby Dick come to town are put under the microscope in language that is both naked and eloquent. The Moby Dick episode is particularly affecting and inspires some of Langford's most thoughtful moments. "There's no acting in the flat black eyes," he says, "of old women watching as the Pequod sailed away."

Langford's already responsible for some of the best rock 'n roll ever made, but even so it's nice to see his own name above the title for once — maybe now he'll get the credit he deserves as one of rock's greatest. A (Bradley Skaught)

BLOOD WRONG
Another Society
PC Music

Do not, I repeat, do not be fooled by the deceptively cool cover art for the latest LP from Another Society, Blood Wrong. The album cover (designed by James Lewis Kaufman) is the only thing the disc has going for it. Overly simplistic and a far cry from inventive, Blood Wrong sounds like bad Tool at best.

The grating metal sounds of "Let Down" start off the exercise in repetition that makes up the bulk of the album. Boredom ensues with the next few tracks that are meant to be high-energy, angry, heavy metal. "No Time for Speech" lacks any regard for musical dynamics or creative lyrics; for example, "Your shadow, my pillow, you thought your plan was good/You followed, you play it, now I'm laid in the ground." Lead vocalist Luke John's generic anger is lost in the midst of hearing the same chord played over and over again at full thrash level. It seems that the same song continues throughout the album, and it is hard to figure out what John is so pissed off about because his words are so inane.

Trax On Trax Off

Packed with uninteresting lyrics and dismal chord progressions, Blood Wrong is meant to be a caffeine rush, but ends up being musical Valium. D+ (Kevin Monahan)

WHISPER
Jim Lauderdale
BMG

Jim Lauderdale's always been too Nashville for the No Depression crowd, and too crafty for the Nashville cats. It's too bad, too, because Lauderdale's eastly one of the best songwriters in modern country and he deserves the praise of both. Neither a rebel nor a sell out, Lauderdale's singular vision has more to do with making great records than playing PR games. And he does, indeed, make great records.

Never much for complexity, Lauderdale's songs defy their own simplicity by stretching the vocabulary of mainstream country to include some Arthur Alexander style soul, a real sense of country's roots, and the brains to put the George Jones back in the mix without looking backwards.

Whisper, Lauderdale's fifth solo album, is by far his most commercial. The production is polished to a sparkle and almost every song would sound well at home on "New Country" radio. That he can be so commercially viable and artistically sound at the same time is a testament to Lauderdale's craft — there's an easy accessibility and sincerity to his work that imbues even the slickest song with genuine heart and soul. In a way he comes off as a less self- conscious Rodney Crowell — as one of a long line of country heroes who were both the stars and the souls of popular country music. There's really no pretension or posturing here — just some genuine twang and an ear for soaring melody. When it comes down to the simple craft of writing a brilliant song, Lauderdale's practically a national treasure.

Whisper may not reach the stunning heights of his 1994 masterpiece Pretty Close to the Truth (a must have for any country music lover), and it lacks the quirky edge of last year's Persimmons, but you'd be hard pressed to find a bad song on here. Besides, when Lauderdale adds another brilliant handful of gems to his already generous bag of great songs, it's always worth the effort. Let's hope country lovers on both sides of the fence will start giving Lauderdale his due — he's a voice too important to lose. Or ignore. A (B.S.)

SPACEY AND SHAKIN
Pete Droge
Fifty Seven / Epic

Pete Droge, the songwriter of such quirky, shiny gems as "If You Don't Love Me, I'll Kill Myself," and "Beautiful Girl," gets distressingly ordinary on his latest release Spacey and Shakin. There is a definite sound to this album, so much so that most of the songs bleed together. There are pounding, straight-forward drums and thick, vaguely psychedelic guitars almost overwhelming the thin but knowing vocals. Despite the consistent sound and energy, there is very little that is catchy or memorable. "Eyes on the Ceiling" manages to resemble a less concise Tom Petty song, but most of the other banging rock songs are annoying and flat. The only wonderful moment is the last number, "Blindly," a wistful little brushstroke of a song and the only one that feels like it was built from an emotion and not from a horribly competent rock pose. C- (Rob Roensch)

Randy Johnson to Kenny Lofton: Pitch wasn't deliberate

By Jim Cour
Associated Press

SEATTLE — Randy Johnson won't appeal his suspension by AL president Gene Budig. That doesn't mean he agrees with it.

"I don't think I did anything wrong," the Seattle Mariners' ace left-hander said Tuesday after being suspended for three games for throwing a fastball too close to Kenny Lofton's head last week in Cleveland. "It wasn't deliberate."

The penalty takes effect tomorrow, meaning Johnson will miss his next scheduled start Saturday night against Minnesota.

Lofton and Indians teammate Sandy Alomar, both of whom were ejected when the benches cleared last Wednesday, were not suspended. Johnson, Lofton and Alomar all were fined undisclosed amounts.

Johnson, off to a slow start this season, insisted he was not trying to hit Lofton in the head.

"I wasn't trying to fire up my team," he said. "It was just a pitch that was up and in. I've thrown a million pitches that have been up and in before.

"I've pitched other people a lot tougher than I've pitched him. Go ask Mike Greenwell. Go ask Mo Vaughn," he said.

In five starts, Johnson is 0-1 with a 7.46 ERA. The former AL Cy Young winner was upset this spring when the Mariners did not give him a contract extension.

Johnson has been moved back to start next Monday night in Kansas City. He started against the Royals in the Kingdome last Monday night, but was knocked out in the fourth inning in a game the Mariners rallied to win 8-7.

Lofton said Johnson has been throwing at him since 1992.

Mariners manager Lou Piniella and general manager Woody Woodward were upset Johnson was the only player suspended.

"Any time you have to move your No. 1 pitcher back a few days, it affects you," Piniella said. "I didn't see any of their players get suspended. It makes me wonder why my guy was."

"I think if you want to talk about who initiated it, I think you're looking at the wrong guy," Woodward said, referring to Lofton. "I think the reaction was unnecessary by the hitter."

The trouble began when Johnson's first pitch — which he said was a slider — was high-and-tight. Lofton stepped toward the mound, and the benches emptied.

Once order was restored, Johnson's next pitch was a fastball even closer to Lofton's head. The benches and the bullpens cleared, and Johnson, Lofton and Alomar were ejected.

The AL said Johnson threw at Lofton after being warned by the umpires.

"I think he over-reacted and made a big deal out of nothing," Johnson said of Lofton.

Johnson said if he intended to hit Lofton in the head, he could have done so.

"I've hit a few people in the head before," he said. "I think I'm a good enough pitcher that if I was trying to hit someone, then I'd probably be able to hit you."

In the future, Johnson said, "I'm not going to pitch him any differently. I'm going right at him. I'll probably pitch him even tougher now."

The next time the Indians play the Mariners will be July 28-30 in Seattle. The teams play their final series in Cleveland, Aug. 25-28.

Johnson said he decided against appealing his suspension because he didn't think he had a chance of winning it. He said he didn't want the suspension to hang over his head all season.

"I just want to get it over with and get this month behind me," he said. "There's no sense in postponing it."

■ Drumm

This weekend against Syracuse, Drumm faces his largest test of all, senior Casey Powell, who netted three goals in last year's 9-4 Orangeman victory in Amherst.

"We got a huge win today [Notre Dame], and now we move on to Syracuse," said Drumm. "A senior going into a game at the Carrier Dome, that's the kind of thing you think about when you're seven-years-old."

Drumm's efficiency stems from his high school days, when Ward Melville racked up a 62-0-2 record in his three years on the team. Since, he has taken part in one of college lacrosse's most tightfisted defenses, one that has held 20 of the last 22 opposing offenses below their season average, spanning the last two seasons.

"Everybody in high school comes out as an All- American," Drumm said. "Coming here, you just have to suck it up. I've kept my work habit up and it's paid off tremendously."

Over the years, the South Setauket, N.Y. native has impressed coaches especially with his work ethic. In the pre- season fitness testing, Drumm topped all Minutemen in the bench press, hoisting up 350 pounds. In the classroom, Drumm looks to continue his studies at SUNY-Stony Brook following graduation, as a some-time club lacrosse player, and a full-time physical therapist. He currently holds a 3.85 grade point average, including a perfect 4.0 in the fall 1996 semester.

Softball to face tough Hofstra squad

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Forget about today's doubleheader in Hempstead, N.Y. between the Massachusetts and Hofstra softball teams in terms of it being a possible preview of the NCAA Tournament Play-in series, which will be held on May 7-8.

While the Minutewomen (31-12, 11-1 in Atlantic 10) and the Flying Dutchwomen (34-13, 7-1 in America East) rank No. 1 and 2 respectively in the Northeast Region, and the play-in series will pit the A-10 champion and the America East champion at the latter's locale this year, anything can happen in postseason conference tournaments.

So, with the fateful Jinx Factor in mind, this is just a doubleheader between two of the Northeast Region's best teams.

At this point of the season, especially with doubleheaders against A-10 foes St. Joseph's and Temple at Totman Field this weekend and one against a 1997 NCAA East Regional participant in Boston College next Tuesday, UMass has to take one day at a time.

"At this point of the season, we're really stepping into the lion's den," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "This is a significant confrontation for our team. But this schedule is made by us, and we want to be playing tough teams at this time of the year.

"These games will show us our strengths and weaknesses, and will be a test on how ready we are to play. The kids are ready, and their effort and attitude are there. No matter what happens, you can control you're effort and attitude, and we really emphasize that."

Added pressure for the Minutewomen to perform at a high level against Hofstra has been squarely placed on junior pitcher Danielle Henderson's shoulders. Henderson (17-6, 0.70 ERA) will make her collegiate return to her home area, as Commack, N.Y., is only a short drive away.

Pressure to perform in front of her hometown fans could be a problem, and the regional media will be there — en force. Yet, her coach believes that her ace will face and then come out of the experience with her head held high.

"This is a great opportunity for her, and I'm glad for her," Sortino said. "Whenever she has had to overcome something, she has risen to every occasion because she's a great competitor. I hope there's a great crowd there.

"She'll be fine and really, she's faced a lot more difficult conditions than this one."

The Flying Dutchwomen will be led by the America East Pitcher and Player-of-the-Week in sophomore Jen Smith, who has found success at the plate and on the mound.

The Gilbertsville, Pa. native leads the team in hitting with a .381 average (.519 slugging percentage, 27 RBI), and pitching (16-8, 1.21 ERA). Behind Smith in both categories is junior catcher Jen Bawol with a .356 batting average (.577 slugging percentage, 34 RBI), and sophomore pitcher Alicia Smith (16-5, 2.22 ERA).

As a team, Hofstra is a hair beneath the .500 mark at the plate (.299), and along with sophomore Melanie Redman and freshman Lisa Ciavardini, the team ERA is a more than respectable 1.61 going into today's contest.

UMass will be led at the plate by its one-two-three batters in the lineup — in reverse order, senior co-captains Kim Guttridge and Tracy Osier and junior Mandy Galas.

Besides Galas, both Gutridge (36 RBI) and Osier (16 RBI) are hitting over .400 (.413 and .405 respectively), and Galas is just a hair beneath .400 herself at a .399 clip. However, when it comes to slugging percentage, the diminutive second baseman (5-foot-3) is at the top of the team (.551).

Throw in eight triples, which ranks her 10th in the nation, and Galas has produced on a variety of levels.

Minutewoman Notes: On the national scene, Henderson has taken over the lead in strikeouts per game with 11.5, and is ninth in ERA (0.70). Along with senior Liz Wagner and freshman Carrie Jeffries, the team ERA ranks fourth (0.84)... With her 27 stolen bases, Osier is now ranked 16th in the nation in stolen bases per game... As a team, UMass is now 18th in batting (.312). Only five teams ranked in the Top 20 nationally are in the Top 20 in both categories.

The UMass softball team travels to Hempstead, N.Y. today to take on Hofstra in a doubleheader.

■ NBA

to keep them at bay, while the interior does its job against the very weak offensive firepower in the key. Nonetheless, Van Gundy's found the key against Miami, and the No. 7 seed will move on, allowing Ewing to offer his services.

New York in five.

Western Conference:

No. 1 Utah vs. No. 8 Houston:

Well, Houston's years are winding down, and a win in this series will mark the end of Clyde Drexler's career, and possibly the dissembling of the entire team. Utah answered last year's critics by reaching the NBA Finals, losing in six. This year, virtually the same team compiled the NBA's best record, gaining home court advantage throughout the playoffs.

Houston doesn't even seem like it wants to be where it is, losing 10 of its last 15 contests. Maybe, though, the Rockets were resting, knowing they had the eighth seed locked up. Salt Lake City hasn't been kind to visitors. Combine that with the extra step Utah will gain with their youth, and it all adds up to a lazz sweep.

Utah in three.

No. 4 Phoenix vs. No. 5 San Antonio:

Easily the most intriguing matchup of the first round, the Suns and Spurs play two completely different styles of basketball. Whoever controls the tempo will prevail. The Suns seemed to dictate it in the regular season, taking three of four from San Antonio. Whoever's weakness is able to hinder the opposition's strength will move on.

San Antonio has arguably the NBA's best frontcourt. There is a big difference between Will Perdue and Sean Elliott, though. Elliott has had a down year in every category, but if healthy, will need to shoot the ball well from the perimeter. Jaren Jackson and Avery Johnson hardly fit the bill. And when you have Reggie Geary getting significant time, you know you're in trouble. He was Cleveland's 12th man in the day.

Phoenix will push the tempo, and has no problem going shot for shot with the Spurs. An injury to Danny Manning will hurt, but Tim Duncan and David Robinson can't do everything. They'll certainly try to do that, but a third man would need to step up. Guard play is always the key. Phoenix has it. San Antonio doesn't.

Suns in five.

No. 3 Los Angeles vs. No. 6 Portland:

A rematch of last year's first-round battle, the Lakers are the hottest team in basketball. Winners of 22 of their last 25, the Lakers' offense is red hot, despite the mediocre second half of the season brought forth by Kobe Bryant. Portland's frontcourt is one of few that can match L.A.'s. Arvydas Sabonis always gives Shaquille O'Neal a decent battle. There aren't many around that offer both size (7-foot-3) and versatility (check out that hook shot).

Portland has plenty of fouls to waste on Shaq, with Sabonis, Kelvin Cato, Brian Grant and Jermaine O'Neal bodying up with the big man. Portland will need a huge series for Sabonis, especially on the defensive side. Sabonis is the only legitimate answer to Big Daddy Diesel. If Shaq has fully recovered from the Taco Bell Syndrome that had previously plagued his career, it will be high tide in the L.A. Forum.

Los Angeles in four.

No. 2 Seattle vs. No. 7 Minnesota:

Before a victory in December over the Sonics, Minnesota had lost 26 straight to their Western Conference counterparts. Minnesota looked a lot like Washington at the tail-end of the season, losing and winning where they shouldn't. With Tom Gugliotta out of the lineup, Minnesota's appearance in the postseason won't last very long. Sam Mitchell hardly matches Gugliotta's numbers or his outright hustle.

Seattle hasn't exactly whipped up a golden ending to its fifth-straight 55-win season, but it's done enough. The Sonics just have to make sure they aren't looking forward to a clash with the Lakers in the next round. First things first. With Gugliotta, the series outlook would be completely different, but there's just too much Baker, Schrempf and too much Glove for Flip to handle.

Seattle in three.

been starting lately," McClellan said. "We were too tight for too long, but I really liked how we organized and recovered. I invited the team to step up at the half, and they did. We really worked well off the ball today, and that was a key factor."

"Some different people showed some nice things, and some of our bench players were able to work into the game. There are a lot of kids demanding playing time, and that's going to put some pressure on our starters."

Sophomore Noelle Gorski continued her solid play for the Minutewomen this season, scoring the first two goals of the game while tallying for three on the day. Combine that with fellow sophomore Stephanie Pavlick, who scored the final goal of the game, and this was truly a team win.

"We have four games left, and we want to come out of it 10-4," Gorski said. "We wanted to look at this team as the No. 1 team in the nation, not who they are. We didn't want to look down on them, even though they are not one of the better teams we'll play against."

"We were a little tired today, but we worked it around pretty well. Everyone got into it, and everyone seemed to score."

"We don't usually beat teams like this, and we're sick of just winning by a goal or two," Pavlick said. "We have three games left on Friday, Sunday and Tuesday, so everybody has to stay in shape, and take care of themselves."

After Bowman's score to tie the game at 3-3, junior tri- captain Melissa Anderson's tally off an assist by freshman Fay Naber started a 1:28 scoring run. Goals by seniors in Jen Herker and Amy Leder, who intercepted the Catamount pass and scored the goal in one gritty effort, stopped the bleeding, and goals by Herker and Gorski bumped the UMass lead up to 8-3 at the half.

Senior tri-captain Jen Bowen sandwiched her lone goal of the day at the 42 mark inbetween two goals by freshman Rachel Ingraffea for a 11-3 lead just 4:53 Into the second half. After Bowman's goal to break the scoring deadlock for Vermont, goals by Naber and Minaker led the team on to the runaway victory.

■ Pavlik

Farnsworth at the top of the circle, then, seeing an opportunity, cut quickly back to her left just before spinning to the direct center of the defense to beat the unsuspecting goaltender.

And this is just what the tandem does on offense.

"They're really mature," Herker said. "They're the youngest players down on the offensive end, from the midfield down, but it really doesn't seem like it."

Indeed, the fact that they are only sophomores might often go unnoticed by fans of the team because of their seemingly experienced play. Not only have the two only been in college for two years, but they've only really been contributors to the lacrosse team for one of those years.

"Neither player got much playing time last year," coach Francesca McClellan said. "Noelle because she was injured and Pavlick because she didn't get in there much. Both have worked hard and have improved so much.

"They've really just been really steady for us. They came in with just about no game experience this year, and they really stepped up. What I like about them as far as participants is they're mentally ready to go. If they make a mistake, they know what they've done and they work to correct it on the field."

Both Pavlick and Gorski spent the off-season trying to overcome key setbacks.

Gorski, who began her lacrosse career redshirted with an injury, learned to play strong despite her past physical pain.

"You've got to have confidence, because I had no confidence at the beginning of the year," Gorski said. "There's the biggest difference when you play with confidence, and then you don't. I'm ort the field now, and I know what I'm doing."

Pavlick's sore spot as a freshman was her ball handling.

"Her ball handling was the issue last year," McClellan said. "She worked her butt off in the off-season to develop that and to make sure she was on the field."

"I think they stepped up because they didn't play last year, so they worked twice as hard to get that extra level," Herker said.

Now, a watcher would have no idea that the either of the two had struggled through anything in recent history. Both players perform with a perfect combination of patience and explosiveness, and both are key elements in the team's 7-4 record this year, already equalling last year's win total and bettering any 11-game mark the squad has had since it's reinstatement in 1992.

Out of the blue, it seems, Gorski and Pavlick have emerged to play both the roles of offensive spark-plugs and defensive stalwarts. And this is only the beginning. Did this surprise anyone?

"They didn't surprise us, we knew they could do it," senior co-captain Amy Leder said. "It was just a matter of being given a chance to do it, and they have, and they've stepped up since day one."

"Other teams don't really know about them, so that's to our advantage," senior co-captain Jen Bowen said. "Next year they might, which means they'll have to step up more. Other teams will know about them then."

"They're learning," McClellan added. "They're both really young players and they're learning. That bodes well for the future. I like how they've been able to contribute this year."

As sophomores, both Pavlick and Gorski embody exactly what a great midfielder should be. Both play solid games overall, and both show flashes of brilliance at both ends of the field.

"Noelle's good on both the offensive and defensive ends," Pavlick said. "She's not just one, she's both, and that's what a midfielder has to be."

"Pav's a smart player, and she's got good stick skills," Gorski said. "She's also a really good all around players."

"They go out and do their job, which is a complement," McClellan said. "Some players go out and try to do too much, and some do too little. You can count on those two going out and doing their job."

A Healthy Investment in Your Future
Health Care. Those two words have been the source of much discussion recently. Probably because we as a nation know the importance of investing in s healthy future.
So do millions of patients who choose chiropractic as their preferred source of health care. The chiropractic beliefs in fitness, nutrition, prevention, and natural maintenance make good sense.
Wellness, you see, is the normal state of being.
New York State government agrees. They have recently passed the Insurance Equality bill that mandates insurance coverage for chiropractic care.
For over 75 years, New York Chiropractic College has upheld a tradition of excellence in chiropractic higher education. Our combined traditions, old and new, have built the base from which the chiropractic doctors of the future are created.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You are going to have to wait your turn today, but you can use the time to your advantage. A search for something special can pay off.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You'll have to listen carefully today when others are giving you instructions. You must be sure that you are doing precisely what you are told.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may find that it's your word against his before the day is out and you must take care that you don't let your emotions take charge.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — When pressed, you may have to admit to certain actions which can, if misinterpreted, turn someone against you. Don't be intimidated!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Your honesty is sure to disarm an opponent today. Once you have the upper hand, you mustn't make the mistake of thinking you can call all the shots.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Turn to an old friend today to teach you what you need to know before embracing a new responsibility. With much of your time today, and you mustn't let yourself be distracted by the kinds of things that can provide "escape."

NBA playoffs will start off on right foot

Oh, the first round, how the first round brings a smile to my face. Finally, we can watch teams that we haven't seen each and every weekend on NBC. I just wish every team could make the playoffs simply to prolong the season before baseball's 162-game schedule gradually slows the rotation of the earth.

The next six weeks promise to keep you on your wallet, especially when watching the Western Conference contenders beat each other up before they become potential Bull prey.

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The East has two outstanding first-round matchups, while the West will, for the most part, wait until the second round to provide the drama.

Here's how things should stack up in the opening round.

Eastern Conference:

No. 1 Chicago vs. No. 8 New Jersey:

The Nets might as well enjoy their weekend in Chicago, because they certainly aren't going to enjoy the way the United Center will treat them. After earning the honor to get humiliated by winning Sunday to make the playoffs, the Nets' Paul Westhead-like style of play, where the idea is to stand still on defense, won't pose any threat to this freight train.

The Nets might escape with a win in game three at home, but only if center Jayson Williams cleans the boards. Williams might not even play, so we'll wait and see. Either way, the Nets' stay in the playoffs might be shortlived, but it could get the ball rolling for a franchise that could use a little nudge. Kudos to Jersey, but it'll go in order in the first.

Bulls in three.

No. 4 Charlotte vs. No. 5 Atlanta:

Despite having home court advantage, Charlotte can't be feeling too optimistic about this. Atlanta swept the season series 4-0, winning by an average of 17 points. Atlanta's balanced attack, especially with the emergence of Alan Henderson, gives the Hawks an extra punch. Coach Lenny Wilkens has implemented a tough, yet conservative defensive plan, headed by Dikembe Mutombo and Mookie Blaylock.

Charlotte's perimeter game must be on the ball to stand a chance. With Glen Rice, Dell Curry, and David Wesley, the Hornets have three jump shots that could propel them into the next round. Although the return of Vlade Divac in the middle gives the Hornets a little more versatility than would backup Matt Geiger, the Hawks shouldn't have any problem with Charlotte.

Atlanta in four.

No. 3 Indiana vs. No. 6 Cleveland:

This one oughta be a dandy, no doubt. With the season series tied 2-2, the Pacers and Cavs should keep the NBA happy by extending the series to five. The key will be the backcourt for each team, because both frontcourts will neutralize each other.

The Pacers bring to the table Reggie Miller and Mark Jackson, while Cleveland counters with rookie Brevin Knight and Wesley Person. Look for Jackson to post up Knight, having five inches on him. His post moves most likely won't earn him any points, but it will draw a double team, leaving Chris Mullin or Antonio Davis open somewhere on the floor.

For Cleveland to win, it has to get a standout performance from its franchise player, Shawn Kemp. The home team has won each of the four games in the series. This time around shouldn't be much different.

Indiana in five.

No. 2 Miami vs. No. 7 New York:

I'm not sure if Las Vegas has a line for "odds on a bench- clearer breaking out," but if it does, go with the over. The Knicks and the Heat just don't like each other, and that's not a secret to anyone.

Don't think that a Patrick Ewing-less paint will open the floodgates for Alonzo do his thing. Knicks coach Jeff Van Gundy has platooned three, sometimes four players, on the opposing center. A big-time performance from Voshon Lenard will be needed for the Heat. Sometimes he shows up, other times he doesn't (0 points in 36 minutes against the Magic late in the year).

Defensively, matched up against Allan Houston and John Starks over the course of the series, Lenard needs

Hard work is paying off for lax's Harold Drumm

JORMA KANSANEN - COLLEGIAN

Harold Drumm, who is among the nation's best defenders, has provided solid leadership for the UMass men's lacrosse team.

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The clock was ticking in the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's most important contest of the year. Against Notre Dame and with a three-game losing streak at their backs, the Minutemen were leading 8-7, but the Irish, who had tied the game in three previous one goal deficit situations, were working the ball for a final shot on UMass goalie John Kasselakis.

With 36 seconds remaining, Irish senior midfielder Jimmy Keenan cradled the ball on the right wing, looking for an opening against UMass senior defenseman Harold Drumm. Drumm gave Keenan his space, leaning towards the middle of the field where much of the Irish offense was standing. Keenan drove right and lobbed a pass intended for Burke Hayes to the middle at the restraining line.

In crunch time, the big players need to make big plays, and on Saturday, Drumm did just that. A candidate for Defenseman of the Year, Drumm made another case for himself, intercepting the pass and securing the Minuteman victory.

Last year, Drumm was named to the United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association (USILA) third team All- America. This year, he was named to the College Lacrosse USA preseason first team All-America.

"I would give it all up for a trip to the Final Four," Drumm said. "I want to get there and play, and if the individual awards come, it's a great bonus."

Coach Greg Cannella has seen it a million times in Drumm's four years in Amherst. In his career, Drumm has managed only four points (three goals, one assist). While the box score rarely reveals a defenseman's ability directly, Drumm chips in where he can. Against Duke, with the team down 5-1 and reeling, Drumm notched his first goal of the season, racing downfield after receiving a pass from Kasselakis and rifling one past Blue Devil goalie Craig Seyffer.

"I don't like to score very much," Drumm said. "It seems that every time I score, we lose. But I'm not superstitious, and if the team needs a boost, I'll do whatever I can to help."

Harold Drumm

Drumm consistently stays within the team concept on defense. Unlike Notre Dame's All-America candidate Todd Ransay, Drumm considers himself more of a positional defender. Rassas, on more than one occasion, stripped a Minuteman attack of the ball, gaining possession.

"Harold's been great," Cannella said. "He's your prototypical defenseman and person. He works extremely hard on and off the field."

Cannella and Drumm have a special bond, dating back to Drumm's adolescent days, when he attended a camp at which Cannella helped. There, he relayed to Drumm that in lacrosse, one has to work hard because nothing comes easy.

While the glory of a defenseman rarely lies in the box score, Drumm takes pride in what remains absent. Game in and game out, it has been Drumm who locks horns with the opponent's most prolific scorer. Through 10 games, only four have found the back of the net when checked by Drumm, all only once.

UMass women's lacrosse beats up on Catamounts

Massachusetts	17
Vermont	4

In reality, it is gruesome; but in the sporting world it is called being "in the wrong place at the wrong time."

Such was the case yesterday afternoon at Totman Field, and after a 8-6 loss to a first-year program in Syracuse last Sunday, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team ran away with a 17-4 obliteration of the Vermont Catamounts.

With 12:56 left in the first half, Vermont's Anne Bowman tied the game at 3-3, but her team would not score for the next 24:59 of the game. With the offense at high gear, the Minutewomen scored eight unanswered goals to boost their record up to 7-4 on the season. That ties the win total of the 1988 squad that finished 7-7-1.

Thoughts of eclipsing the 10-win total for the first time since 1983 are dancing around in the heads of the UMass faithful, and with three games left against beatable opponents (Boston College, New Hampshire and Boston University), that just might be the case.

However UMass coach Francesca McClellan is still seeing a lack of intensity and focus from her troops coming out of the gates. A variety of bench players like freshman Shalee Merkle, who registered her first career point on an assist on sophomore Rebecca Minaker's goal with 10:55 remaining in the game, were able to eventually see time in the blowout, but it took a challenge at halftime to fully spark her team.

"I'm still not happy with how we've

Sophomores Pavlik and Gorski stepping up for women's lacrosse

By Seth Koenig

A midfielder in women's lacrosse, by trade, is a player who can apply pressure on the opposing goal in a leadership role on offense, and also be able to get back to her own goal on defense in time to stop any threat the other team might be presenting.

Against Vermont on Wednesday afternoon, with 2:43 to go in the game, Massachusetts women's lacrosse sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlik pulled the ball out of a crowd roughly 20 feet in front of the Catamount cage and juggled it into her control. With a second of hesitation to freeze the handful of defenders between herself and UMass' 17th point of the game, she bolted toward Vermont netminder Kate Farnsworth and calmly whipped the ball into the net for her first score of a game in which she spent the first three quarters being double-teamed down low to keep her from acquiring her 20th point of the season.

Her classmate and fellow midfielder, Noelle Gorski, spent those three quarters of the game tearing apart the Catamount defense en route to a hat trick that consisted of three equally stunning offensive plays. One, less than a minute after senior teammate Jen Herker upped the lead to 7-5, saw Gorski do what Gorski does best: she cruised patiently around the left wing until she was directly in front of

UM–Harvard meet at Beanpot

It's rematch time in the Beanpot final at Fenway today at 2 p.m. as the Massachusetts baseball team is set to tangle with Harvard, the 1997 Ivy League Champions.

Last year, the Minutemen defeated Harvard 11-4 in the championship to repeat as Beanpot champions. On Tuesday, the Crimson crushed Northeastern 11-0 in their semifinal to improve to 21-9 and earn a berth in the championship game. UMass beat Boston College on Tuesday, 7-2. Second baseman Muchie Dagliere became the school's all-time consecutive games hit leader at 29. Scott Barnaby earned the win with his start and Rich Hartman retired the side in the ninth to close things out.

Massachusetts has also beaten the Huskies this year as they scored three runs in the ninth for a 7-6 win last Thursday. Barnaby earned the win as he struck out three in the last two innings to improve to 1-1.

Yesterday, the Minutemen played at Maine but results were not available at press time. Travis Veracks was set to make the start against the Black Bears.

Easterns another goal for UM water polo

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Back in February, when members of the Massachusetts women's water polo team were considering their goals for the season, the only acceptable answer was a trip to the Easterns, hopefully leading to the national championships in Los Angeles.

Now it's April, and the Minutewomen have achieved the first half of their goal. Starting tomorrow, UMass will play in the Easterns in Maryland. With a top three finish in the Easterns they will secure a bid to the national championships.

What is it going to take for UMass to achieve the second half of their goal? They will need to continue to use the defense that has paralyzed some of the best offenses in the nation and a offense that began clicking at just the right times.

The defense has held strong against No. 20 Harvard three times this season, No. 17 Princeton twice, No. 10 UC-San Diego, and No.12 Maryland and No. 6 USC.

The offense has been unmatched in the last 16 games, a span during which UMass has not lost.

The Minutewomen will be facing competition that they have seen before. They will see Brown, Princeton and Slippery Rock in the first round of the Easterns and, depending on how they fare, will advance to stronger competition. The toughest competition at Easterns will be Maryland, which will have the home pool advantage.

"We are not worried, if we continue to play the way we have been playing we should do fine," coach Dan McOsker said.

UMass has defeated every team it will play in this tournament at least once, and with its offensive attack the team should be able to do more of the same at the Easterns.

Offensively, Katie Grogan's name keeps coming up. She now has scored 82 goals — including her nine-goal performance in the game against Harvard at New Englands. Other major contributors include Barbara Hickey, Claudia Clement, Marcie Hupp and Andrea Vazquez.

The freshmen have also been an unexpected surprise, as Sarah Newell, Erin Hillier and Katie Mayer have been a consistent addition to the squad and the team's offense.

"We are very confident, and we assume that the intensity level of all the other teams will be very high, but our intensity has remained high and I think this will be of benefit to us," McOsker said.

The No. 5 UMass team (24-3) really has everything clicking just at the right time of the season and are looking to finish off what they started back in February by attempting to qualify for nationals.

"I don't think that we will need to make any adjustments, we should play well because our offense is clicking and our defense has just been consistent," McOsker said.

Senate to debate Puerto Rico's status

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) — Refusing to take "no" for an answer, Puerto Rico's pro-statehood governor is determined to convince the Senate that it's time the Caribbean island gets a chance to join the Union.

Gov. Pedro Rossello returned to Washington yesterday for the second time in a month to lobby for legislation that would authorize an island referendum on Puerto Rico's political status.

On April 1, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott told Rossello that there wasn't enough time to consider the measure this year — the centennial of Puerto Rico's takeover by the United States. But buoyed by a March vote in the House of Representatives supporting a plebiscite, Rossello said Tuesday he hoped to change Lott's mind.

"The fact is that for 100 years the Stars and Stripes have been in Puerto Rico and that this is an unresolved issue," the governor said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"We have a historic opportunity now and that both from the perspective of Puerto Rico and the perspective of the nation [it is] something that has to be tackled.

Husband & wife shoot each other

FRESNO, Calif. (AP) — A husband and wife pulled guns on each other and shot it out at church during a marriage counseling session after he arrived late drinking a beer.

Both were wounded.

With a beer in one hand and a gun in the other, Michael Martin shot his wife Wednesday as she tried to walk out of the meeting at St. James Episcopal Cathedral, their counselor said yesterday. A bleeding Bonnie Martin pulled a pistol from her purse and shot her husband in the shoulder.

The two took the gun battle outside, where Mrs. Martin collapsed and was fired on again. Martin allegedly hit his wife at least once more before he ran out of bullets.

"It's a good thing that he had been drinking because he could have hit her more," said the Rev. Bud Searcy, head of the New Creation Ministries, which runs the counseling sessions. "He was a lousy shot."

Martin was treated at a hospital and released; Mrs. Martin was in serious condition yesterday.

Police said they will seek attempted murder charges against both.

The shooting occurred shortly after Martin arrived late for the counseling at St. James, which rents out an office to Searcy's group.

"They were arguing. It was your typical domestic dispute. Then the fireworks started," said the Rev. Russell Willingham, the Martins' counselor.

Zoll raises issues about neutral gender coverage

Founder of "Take Our Daughters to Work" discusses Jonesboro case

JOHN BURT - COLLEGIAN

Miriam Zoll takes a question from Chancellor Scott yesterday at her lecture, "Jonesboro, Guns, Girls and Boys: The Missing Link in the Newsroom."

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Miriam Zoll, University of Massachusetts alumni and co-founder of the "Take Our Daughters to Work" campaign spoke yesterday about gender neutral news coverage in the nation's newsrooms in a lecture titled, "Jonesboro, Guns, Girls and Boys: The Missing Link in the Newsroom," Speaking."

Zoll presented her lecture by referring to the press coverage of the Jonesboro shootings, which occurred a month ago today in which two boys who killed fours girls in a middle school in Arkansas.

"I started looking at the media coverage on the Jonesboro murders and what was disturbing to me, which is disturbing to me many days when I see the headlines, is the gender neutral coverage by the media about men violence against women and boy violence against girls," Zoll said.

As the media coverage of the shooting, journalists asked many experts their opinions of why the incident occurred.

Some responses were from the gun culture in America, family problems such as divorce and boys not getting the support that they need.

"Nowhere in this analysis except in one place, which was the Christian Science Monitor, a professor from Wheelock college put her finger on the analysis that is the question of masculinity and man gender roles," Zoll said.

"In our country gender roles are something that our culture and our educators and our media has turned into an event and a reality which only exist for women," she said.

Zoll explained that most males in this country are trained especially as children not to talk or think about how their male gender role influence their behavior.

"The media coverage of Jonesboro reflects this trend around the country," Zoll said.

For an example she used a headline from a recent Boston Globe article which read "Student arraigned on rape charge."

"If the media is still dominated by men and is still dominated by men who do not have strong gender consciousness... they are going to come out with these headlines and allow this to come out in the newspaper," she said.

Zoll said recently researchers are trying to convince the public that girls are beginning to commit as much violent acts as boys.

However, the Federal Bureau Investigation (FBI) statistics "on violent crime dating back to 1993 show that 90 percent, outside of child abuse because both mother and father commits act of violence against their children but in the mainstream culture 90 percent of violent acts are committed by men," she said.

Zoll suggested to the audience of 50 members that journalists and the public need to begin talking with each other from the perspective of male gender roles.

"We need to have conversations about what does it mean when if you are a man or a boy; what does it mean when someone jostles you on the street and your response is to pick a fight with them," she said.

She said it is only when actions such as this begin to occur can the public begin to deal with violence committed against women in a different way.

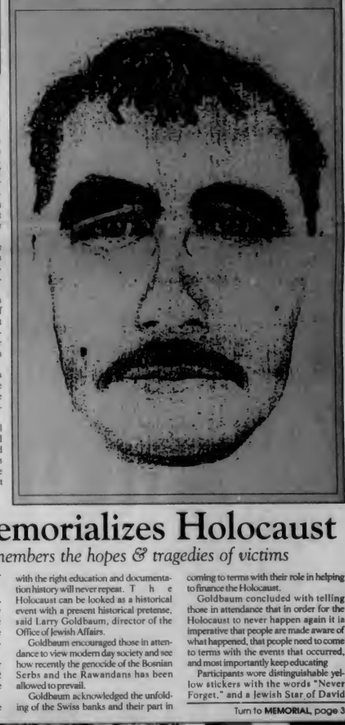
Following her presentation, Zoll held a question and answer period in which she further discussed issues mentioned in her lecture, as well as any other issues audience members wanted to comment about.

UM police release composite sketch of alleged peeping tom

A composite of an male individual has been released by the University of Massachusetts Police department regarding two similar peeping tom incidents that have been reported over the past month.

On April 11, a female resident of John Quincy Adams (JQA) Residence Hall reported to public safety that an individual was attempting to photographer her while in a shower stall according to a public safety report.

This alleged incident is similar to a report that public safety received on Thursday, March 26 from a second individual from JQA. She reported "a male with a camera taking pictures of individuals taking showers." UMass Chief of Police John Luippold said in a previous interview.



Based on descriptions given to the police by the alleged victims and other witnesses, public safety drew a composite and are searching for an individual described as "a white male, early thirties, weighing approximately 170 pounds, and 5-feet-8 inches tall. He has short black hair, bushy eyebrows, mustache with a small mole on his right cheek."

Also, police are looking for an older model (1990) white Oldsmobile.

Anyone who may have information regarding these incidents or knows of a male fitting the above description should contact the UMass police immediately. In addition, residents who observe individuals loitering in their residence hall, especially in the early evening hours, should also contact public safety.

Students can contact public safety at 545-2121 or through UMass' anonymous phone tip line at 577-TIPS

Student plans to file lawsuit against GEO

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts graduate student Sean Werle is planning to file a lawsuit against the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) over what he calls an unfair "tax" on graduate students.

Werle, a entomology graduate student, said he received over 30 e-mails in response to a letter he published in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. In the letter Werle announced his intention to file a lawsuit against GEO because of a 2 percent agency fee GEO will collect once it becomes a union.

Under the new contract GEO members would be required to pay dues which amount to 2 percent of their earnings. Graduates who do not want to become members will have to pay an agency fee. GEO said the agency fee would be less than 2 percent but the figure has not yet been determined.

"To charge a sliding scale isn't fair," Werle said. "[GEO] is asking well-paid students to pay more."

Werle said a fee is a fixed charge, and the agency fee GEO is imposing would be a tax. Werle has no grudge against GEO, and supports them, but does not want their advocacy.

"I want them to have their contract, but why am I being forced to subsidize it?" he said. "I don't harbor any animosity towards GEO. GEO has a place on campus, but I think some students feel they don't need that advocacy," Werle said.

"Maybe it's a selfish attitude, but they're asking me to pay for their child care," Werle said.

Jon Zerolnick, co-chief negotiator for GEO, said some graduates may not realize it but they receive benefits from GEO's advocacy.

"Some people feel that they don't need representation by the union, but it's undeniable that services are received," Zerolnick said. "You pay your fair share and if you don't like something, you get involved and change things."

Jennifer Fasulo, GEO vice-president, used the example of the curriculum-fee waiver, something won in a GEO contract seven years ago.

She said back then the curriculum fee was about $50 and now is about $2,000. She said even though some graduates don't pay their GEO dues, they enjoy the benefits GEO has won, like the waiver.

"It's helpful when you have a union to back you up," Fasulo said. "[The contract] was passed overwhelmingly, we followed the legal process, it's legal to require an agency fee."

GEO in the past has asked that students pay dues voluntarily. Mahmood Ketabchi, GEO president, said the reason the organization is becoming a union is because so many graduates pay their dues voluntarily.

"Sixty to 70 percent of graduate employees are currently paying dues voluntarily," Ketabchi said. "It's because of this we are being recognized as a union, and that has been the case since GEO has started."

Werle said he does not pay dues for GEO and voted against ratification of the GEO contract. He said he does not question the legality of what GEO is doing, but will be fighting the law

Service memorializes Holocaust

Annual ceremony remembers the hopes & tragedies of victims

By Morgan Tobor
Collegian Correspondent

Yesterday evening, speakers, poetry readers, singers and their prayers all came together in remembrance of the Holocaust with a candle lighting memorial service.

The memorial service was a time for remembrance of the Holocaust, the 12 million people persecuted in during the World War II and its survivors.

It was a time for hope that in the future with the right education and documentation history will never repeat. The Holocaust can be looked as a historical event with a present historical pretense, said Larry Goldbaum, director of the Office of Jewish Affairs.

Goldbaum encouraged those in attendance to view modern day society and see how recently the genocide of the Bosnian Serbs and the Rawandans has been allowed to prevail.

Goldbaum acknowledged the unfolding of the Swiss banks and their part in coming to terms with their role in helping to finance the Holocaust.

Goldbaum concluded with telling those in attendance that in order for the Holocaust to never happen again it is imperative that people are made aware of what happened, that people need to come to terms with the events that occurred, and most importantly keep educating.

Participants wore distinguishable yellow stickers with the words "Never Forget," and a Jewish Star of David

SGA fund allocation raises grave questions

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

NEWS ANALYSIS

The responsibility of the Senate's Ways and Means Committee to allocate funds to Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) and Agencies is one of the most important functions performed by the Student Government Association (SGA).

Invariably when budgets are discussed larger questions are raised and the interests of different groups are weighed against each other for control of available funds. Some propose more money should be diverted to agencies such as WMUA and the Office of ALANA Affairs, while others argue that more investment needs to be made in RSOs such as AHORA and the Outing Club.

Recently the Ways And Means Committee decided upon a preliminary budget for the next fiscal year. Twenty-six RSOs and Agencies are in the process of appealing or have already appealed their budgets for the next year.

Seth Avikian, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee said that this appeals process happens every year and this is not an unusual number of appeals requests.

Each organization has a scheduled meeting with the committee and the meetings will run until Sunday. Avikian said the findings of the committee will not become public information until the committee puts next year's budget before the senate to be ratified.

Discussions of money call attention to the disparity between the have's and have not's. Like the administration the SGA must also decide how important diversity is.

A common argument is that the funding allocated to the Office of ALANA Affairs and the RSO's pertaining to ALANA students is disproportionate.

Office Director Nelson Acosta said, "ALANA students are the most marginalized least powerful group on campus... the idea that we receive too much funding is laughable."

Acosta said he felt the committee is doing a fair job, but argued the office should be funded through the university like the Stonewall Center and Office of Jewish Affairs.

Acosta said he won't let funding divide ALANA with other communities. He said he one day hopes ALANA can have a house like Hillel that would foster a productive environment for ALANA students.

Speaking of the Jewish community and their relationship with the ALANA community, one of the RSOs which was hit hardest was Hillel/Jewish Student Union (JSU), which received nearly a 25 percent cut in funds from $9,000 to under $7,000.

Dan Friedman, JSU Vice President of Administrative Affairs, said if the cut stands, his organization won't be able to mainfain the same level of activism.

"A lot of our programs are open to everyone on campus," Friedman said.

The JSU has put forth a petition for students concerning its budget and is urging students to attend its Sunday meeting with the committee.

Former Hillel President and Republican Club Vice- President Jamie Resnick said Hillel had consistently filed appeals to the budget until last year when he felt the funds were sufficient.

"We usually gained about $300," Resnick said.

Although he is upset with the budget allocation, Resnick did support the increase proposed for the Republican Club, which has many members in the student senate.

Resnick said if one combines the funds allocated to the Republican Club and the Silent Majority (who published "the Minuteman), it comes close to the Hillel budget.

"Budgets should be decided on activism, not on politics, and the Republican Club has been active," he said.

Resnick is not the only supporter for the restoration of Hillel's budget.

Orchard Hill Senator Philipe Blue sits on the committee and is a member of Hillel. Blue said he will not receive a vote on the budget because of the conflict of interest, but will advocate for an increase.

The JSU is one of only many stories, and giving it more money will mean subtracting funds from someone else, like the Science Fiction Society who currently do not have a computer to catalogue their library.

Religious views debated

By Dylan Larke
Collegian Staff

Four clergy members spoke about their religious views on Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender [GLBT] issues on a panel Tuesday night in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center.

Panelists for the GLBT student group Pride Alliance and UMass GLBT Stonewall Resource Center sponsored event included Rabbi Eddie Feld from the Hillel Houses of Amherst and Smith Colleges, UMass Chaplin Reverend Chris Carlisle, Northampton Unitarian Universalist GLB issues lay leader Margaret Babbot and Protestant religious advisor Dean Clark of Amherst College.

Speakers talked to approximately 30 undergraduates, graduates and community members and answered questions from their own religious beliefs and expertise.

Feld opened with an explanation of how to read the Bible from the Jewish perspective. Feld discussed how he thought the "Bible must be read through the eyes of interpretation."

Feld also responded to those who object to homosexual unions on moral grounds.

Feld said, "[Part] of what it means to be a human being is to find a partner and to fulfill oneself sexually. A moral reading of the Bible asks us to ask anyone to give up that which is integral to self."

Carlisle compared GLBT people to the marginalized people that Jesus focused on and spoke of how she felt sexuality was not the most crucial point of Jesus' discourse.

"Jesus always included those who were most marginalized and most oppressed. Jesus was constantly finding God's power by leaving institutional power," Carlisle said.

Babbott spoke about the pro-active role the Unitarian Society has taken in terms of GLBT matters. Babbott explained how the society has 11 resolutions regarding GLB concerns including a non-discrimination clause for membership and clergy, commitment ceremonies for same- sex couples and education surrounding GLB awareness.

The Unitarian Society has a curriculum called the "Welcoming Congregation" that allows members to look at homophobia within themselves.

Babbott said, "It's a hard class, there's a lot of tears and a lot of laughter, [but] there's a real openness to the struggle to make the congregation a really welcoming place for GLB people."

Clark, the last panelist to speak, talked about how his Congregational Church has voted to be "open and affirming" toward GLBT people.

Clark also spoke about the arrival of the Friends of Jesus, a Maine religious group that distributed information condemning homosexuality, on the campus center concourse during the past few days.

Clark urged the UMass community to "attend one of the educational events or in some way let the members of our community who are gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender know they are supported and not alone."

This religious panel and other events condoning homosexuality sponsored by UMass GLBT groups have taken place all this week in protest to the Friends of Jesus.

In the April 23 edition of the Collegian, it was reported that the a capella group Six Minutes would be performing at the Senior Commencement Ball. This information was incorrect; the a capella group Meanwhile will perform at the Ball. The Collegian regrets the error.

Amherst residents asked to give their cars a break

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

In an effort to raise environmental awareness, a group of Amherst citizens have organized the Amherst Earth Day Committee, and declared this week "Give Your Car A Break Week." The week culminates in a parade tomorrow.

The program is part of an effort to get citizens to explore means of transportation other than cars. People are urged to do everything from car pooling to rollerblading.

The committee has printed up 2,000 "participation cards," which can be used to count how many miles people have saved using alternative means of transportation.

After the parade tomorrow, the total of all the miles saved will be counted.

"There is a need to remind the public that automobiles must be used in a cautious manner," said Hwei-Ling Greeney, organizer of "Give Your Car A Break Week." Greeney is the coordinator for a soup kitchen in Amherst, and is a member of the Amherst Earth Day committee.

"We want to be in solidarity with mother Earth," Greeney said.

Greeney said the 10 members of the committee have been working with members of the community to put the parade together.

People are encouraged to participate in the parade using their favorite alternate mode of transportation. There will be rollerbladers, skateboarders, cyclers and walkers. The parade will go from the Unitarian Society Meetinghouse to Sweetser Park, at 1 p.m.

Greeney said the parade will be led by a fiddle player. At the park there will be a song, a clown and a giant paper mache globe. The participation cards will be collected and tallied and placed inside the globe.

There will also be a speech by pro-

Greeney said they have received help from University of Massachusetts professors and students. They have helped put up posters and alert students to the event.

"We are in a very key position to make it or break it in averting this global warming trend," Greeney said.

She said the United States accounts for about half of all the carbon dioxide generation in the world. Greeney said carbon dioxide generation is one of the major causes of the global warming trend and much of the production of this gas comes from automobiles.

"Cutting back on fossil fuel consumption is the key," Greeney said.

Greeney said this could be the start of an annual Earth Day celebration in Amherst.

"I am a town resident, and have a family here. We love this town so much, we want to make sure it is a safe town and has a future," Greeney said.

Greeney said she was alerted to the problems caused by automobiles when she became involved in the parking garage debate in Amherst. She ran a committee to get people to vote against the garage.

imprinted on them.

These stickers were worn in remembrance of the discrimination that the Jews endured during their persecution.

"In order to know where you're going you need to know where you're coming from," said Erica Pirdade, quoting an old African proverb. Pirdade is the Resident Director of the Baker/Chadbourne/Greenough (BCG) residence halls.

This proverb echoed during many speeches discussed by the various multi-cultural speakers.

Consistency throughout the speakers included education, personal experiences and Holocaust awareness.

Kolot, UMass's Jewish a cappella group, preformed three songs addressing the tragedies, hopes and strengths the prisoners endured.

This annual memorial service was developed by Jamie Resnick, a senior political science and BDIC major and Robin Carcus, a senior theater major. Both Resnick and Carcus are Resident Assistants (RAs) for BCG residence areas.

The memorial service was just one of the many remembrance programs put on during Hillel's Holocaust memorial week.

Teen pleads guilty in court

By Todd Spangler
Associated Press

WILMINGTON, Del. — A young woman charged along with her high school sweetheart with murdering their newborn at a motel fell sobbing into her mother's arms Wednesday before pleading guilty to manslaughter.

Amy Grossberg, 19, entered the plea a month after her boyfriend, Brian Peterson, turned against her.

Manslaughter carries a maximum of 10 years in prison. Under sentencing guidelines, Ms. Grossberg and Peterson could each get up to 2 1/2 years.

Ms. Grossberg's voice cracked as she answered the judge's questions about her plea. Minutes before the hearing began, she convulsed into sobs in the embrace of her mother, who stroked her hair.

Ms. Grossberg and Peterson, 19, were both initially charged with first-degree murder, and prosecutors said they might seek the death penalty after their baby was found in November 1996 wrapped in plastic in a trash bin behind the motel in Newark where Ms. Grossberg had given birth.

The state medical examiner's office said the boy was born alive at full term and died of skull fractures caused by blows and shaking.

Ms. Grossberg's lawyers would not say what prompted her guilty plea, but Peterson had pleaded guilty to the same charge last month and agreed to testify against her at her trial in May. Peterson, according to his lawyers, believed the baby was stillborn and put it in a plastic bag in the trash after Ms. Grossberg yelled, "Get rid of it! Get rid of it!"

Ms. Grossberg's lawyer, Robert Tanenbaum, said the young woman takes "full responsibility" for actions that led to the infant's death.

"At no time were there any intentions to hurt anyone or do anything," he said. "She should have never gone to the motel. They had no plan. They were two scared teen-agers who were in over their heads."

A vicious circle

Last night the king of sensationalism, FOX aired "The World's Wildest Police Videos." In an effort to lure viewers to their network, FOX relies on showing explicit videos, videos that depict violence, something that for some reason people love to see.

There seems to be something about the thin screen of the television which separates us from the very real violence which is going on in front of our eyes. Most people don't realize that the violence on these shows is real and terrible, because of that separation.

It's not just violence that plagues us. The way in which women are often portrayed on television is a problem as well. The media, especially advertisements, project an image of the perfect woman to get people to buy their products. These images teach women that they have to look perfect, that they have to diet and lose weight, get breast implants and dye their hair, wear make-up and the right clothes.

Jason Eiseman

But I don't blame the media. I don't blame advertisements, television or movies. I blame you, every last one of you. Don't worry I blame myself as well. I am a hypocrite, but there are millions of other hypocrites out there too. We're all hypocrites.

I hear people talk about how horrible the media is. "There's too much violence, too much sex. I don't like the way women are portrayed," are common sentiments. But changing the media is not the answer. People must change, society must change. The media is just catering to what people want. If people ask for it the media will give it to them.

Media is a reflection of society not the other way around. The media is not causing problems in our society it is a reflection of it. If you have a problem with what's on television, or what you see in the movies, then look at the world around you. The problem is in the real world not in the media.

Sometimes it seems like a paradox and the media can't win. People beg and plead for the violence and sex that mass media provides, and then denounce the media for providing it. But the media does win, because in the end people can't get enough sex and violence.

Look at the situation in Arkansas with the school children who opened fire on their schoolmates. What is the cause of this violence? Maybe it is because people are becoming desensitized to violence, and that is because of the media. But the media plays the violence because it's what people want to see. It is a vicious circle.

The videos I mentioned before that were shown on FOX last night trivialize the dangerous work that many police officers do; more importantly the videos used violence as an entertainment tool.

FOX entices viewers with glimpses of violence that they can't ordinarily see in their own lives. Because it is on television there is still something about the violence which does not seem real to the human mind. There is something about the television screen which creates a separation between the horrors depicted in the videos and the horrors of real violence. Therein lies the danger.

Despite the damage these shows are causing to society, and despite some of the controversy surrounding them, the public wants to watch them. The public loves to see violence.

The same thing goes for the image of the perfect woman. Everywhere in the media, women can't escape the images of beautiful women, supermodels. These images reinforce the negative images many young women have of themselves. Eating disorders abound, girls at young ages are turning to dieting to change their image.

No matter how much people complain, this media image will not change as long as society reinforces these values. The media did not create this phenomena, they found out what people wanted and fed into it.

I don't believe in censorship, and I don't think we should tell the media what they can and can't program. But there is another way to regulate it. There is a very simple way to make a statement to the media.

Stop watching violent television shows. Stop watching movies in which the hero solves problems with violence. Stop buying products that use unattainable images of beauty. Take the money out of it. If companies start loving money they will find another way to entertain the public.

When, or I should say if, the media gets the message that people do not want and will no longer stand for the trash they are shoving down our throats, things will change.

As for me, I didn't watch FOX last night.

The sporting life

I'm a sports fan.

I love the Florida Panthers and I've always been a bit partial to Notre Dame football. I like Dennis Rodman. I have Gary Sheffield's autograph on a TCBY napkin. If I could meet any professional athlete, it would have to be Michael Jordan.

Come on, who doesn't want to be like Mike?

But on the flip side, I have no idea how long it's been since the Dodgers won a pennant. I'm not sure who held the record for the worst losing streak coming off of a World Series win until the Marlins grabbed that brass ring. And I only recently learned that "par," "birdie" and "bogie" have real definitions.

Karen Sonnwald

So my knowledge isn't extensive. It's not even quite up to par. But that's the beauty of it. Even though I have limited knowledge outside of my realm, sports are still fun to watch. And I know a goal when I see one.

Athletics at UMass, whether it's varsity, intramural, or even a wiffleball tournament in your own backyard, provide the commonality that we're lacking everywhere else. As diverse as our campus is, sports seem to be the only avenue that fosters unity. We are a campus plagued by dissent: What's happening with the Student Government Association (SGA)? Would an Honors College alienate certain people? Are we a flyer-friendly campus? Can we or can't we drink?

But I have a better question: Can we or can't we find something, anything that promotes the seemingly far-fetched notion that here, at UMass, we'd all be part of the same community?

It's blatantly obvious that, in all walks of life, different groups have different agendas. But you'll find our conflict- riddled campus on the same page once they're fired up at a lacrosse game. You'll find a sense of uncanny loyalty as fans prep themselves for the Minutemen to take the ice at Mullins. You'll be thrilled when our varsity sports emerge victorious, but you'll be equally thrilled when your roommate's team takes home the wiffleball crown.

It's a phenomenon.

It inspires a diverse group of students to come together, for just a moment, to partake in one of the most ritualistic aspects of college.

We rally.

We get behind our teams.

As spectators, we get fired up for games. We taunt the opposing team. Maybe we curse the refs for a bad call. Sometimes we tailgate beforehand. But under any circumstances, the outcome really matters. We're bummed if we lose, we're elated if we win. Because it's our team, we somehow have a stake in the matter.

And it's hard to talk politics over wiffleball.

Even if you're amongst those who prefer not to wield a racket or tote some clubs, you've got to be intrigued by the people who do. What is it exactly that makes certain teams so good? What is it exactly that inspires a team of thirtysomethings to play Top Gun in Haigis Hoopla? What is it exactly that motivates a group of students to go for a two, three, maybe four mile run after their morning class?

It's the culture of athletes.

It's a mentality, a motivation, the part of all of us that prefers excellence over mediocrity. It's the part of us that is all too familiar with the phrase It's not whether you win or lose; it's how you play the game.

But no one really likes to lose.

There's no underlying motive, no ideological plan. There's no obscure, unexplained, or undisclosed agenda that usually accompanies anything not met with complete apathy on our campus. Whether we compete for fun, or compete to win, it's readily apparent — we all compete.

It carries over into the classroom as well, but unfortunately academics don't lend themselves to the group consciousness that sports provide. That's simply because while academics have a limited audience, sports are universal. It's quite possible that even the most talented chemist can't comprehend a passage in Hamlet and just because an English major can navigate Shakespeare doesn't mean that he or she knows the atomic number of boron. You see, the intellectual world is far too vast to find common ground. But basketball? Everyone knows basketball.

That's not to say that athletics has the primary place in our lives as students. We are here for an education. But if you're looking for cohesiveness, you're not going to find it in Bartlett Hall.

College isn't all fun and games.

But it's kind of hard to get fired up over an English class.

WATCHING THE BOTTOM LINE.

Teach our children

When we think of a young child, usually the image in our minds is that of a small, cute little tyke, playing with blocks or tending to her dolly. Or, at least that's what we used to think of. Nowadays, too often the images we see in our minds and on the news are of bloody sidewalks and prepubescent offenders.

In the wake of the Jonesboro, Ark., shootings, the latest gruesome story of innocence lost is that of the rape of a 3-year-old girl, kidnapped and attacked by three little boys, ages 7, 8 and 11, over Easter weekend in West Dallas. What happened to our society that we produce such monsters? How could children so young conceive of a crime so horrible, let alone muster up the courage to commit it? The two younger boys, because they are less than 10 years old, cannot be charged with the crime. Instead, the two brothers have been taken from their parents' custody. The same parents who failed to instill in them the morals necessary to short circuit any thought of such evil before it came to life. The same parents who bred monsters.

Is that too harsh? Are the people most directly responsible for their offsprings' actions actually unaccountable for their crimes? Should we instead blame the violence on television, the "liberal" media, rap and metal music? No, because we are all to blame.

Society has a responsibility to protect and guide its young members to become responsible, productive adults. If parents are unwilling or incapable of raising their children, society is supposed to step in and take over, in the form of teachers, child protective services, counselors, even friends. But in the past couple of decades, crimes committed by children have become more visible, more heinous with each passing day. And we run around like chickens with their heads cut off, wondering what to do.

It's simple: raise and protect your children to the best of your ability, or get help if you can't give them the guidance they need. Those of us who haven't already started families are likely to in the near future. We must take care to instill discipline and morals in them, and not be afraid to drive home the message with stiffer punishments than taking away their Nintendo privileges. Today's children show a woeful misunderstanding of the meaning of responsibility and accountability. They don't care because they've seen that society doesn't care.

All members of a society are responsible for its children. If you see a troubled child, do what you can to help. You can tutor children after school, or just provide a safe place for them to stay when their parents aren't home. Volunteer with local agencies. We need to help those on the line between innocence and destruction — before it's too late for all of us.

The ethics of religion

I was walking through the Campus Center yesterday when I noticed a very large sign that said, "Why fornication and homosexuality are wrong." What? I gasped in astonishment. What kind of ridiculousness is this? As I got closer I noticed signs and pamphlets explaining why my personal behavior is wrong.

First of all, why do I need anyone telling me why I am wrong? I got closer and picked up a few of the pamphlets just to see what they had to say. Hey, I have an open mind. What I came to find out is obviously, they don't. As I listened to them (and when I say "them," I mean the people claiming to be Christians) talk, they espoused their view that if someone is homosexual or has premarital sex they will go to hell. As I read over the pamphlets one phrase kept repeating itself, "God is a God of love." Okay, now if "God is a God of love," then why would he be sending anyone to hell?

Bridget Dolezsar

I realized this was a much deeper issue however, because whenever religion is brought into a situation it obviously complicates things. I don't know about any one else's beliefs, but in my eyes, if there is a God, he certainly wouldn't be punishing anyone and he definitely would stand for that four letter word that makes existence worthwhile — love.

The fact that they use the word "fornication" shows how willing they are to twist language for their own purposes. "Fornication" holds negative connotations, and to cast pre- marital or homosexual sex in such a light is ignorant. It is also ignorant to assume God would punish two people for making love. They say that God is love but then say that he will punish people for making love.

Two older friends of mine come to mind when I say this. These two people just celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary and their seven children threw them a huge celebration. The wife had gotten pregnant and they had a quick shot-gun wedding. They went on to create seven children and build a beautiful life together. When the man stood up to make a toast to the 50 wonderful years he had spent with his wife, he said, "I will never regret that night in the back of a car." Of course everyone laughed, but the point is, if they hadn't gone with their feelings and with that beautiful — not sinful — moment, who knows where they'd be today? They are a stark contrast to the lifeless human beings sitting in the Campus Center telling everyone that they are wrong. I certainly don't preach that if you don't have sex before you are married that you are wrong.

So, what about this homophobic thing? If God is one of love, he definitely wouldn't have a problem with homosexuality. In fact he'd be its number one supporter because it's just more people loving each other. Does it really matter if it's woman to woman or man to man? Absolutely not! God loves all, right? Well, obviously not to the "Christians" behind the table in the Campus Center. To them God discriminates and only loves the people that follow their inane rules. Hmm... this sounds awfully familiar. Can anyone say cult? Hey, if you're a Christian, doesn't it mean you are supposed to be a nice person? As I last remembered, nice people accept others for whom they are and if you want to talk about the Bible, then what about "Judge not thy neighbor?" Now it seems like I'm picking on them and I don't mean to, but let's get to my main point. As I wrote last year: people are people whether they fornicate before marriage or wait until after marriage, whether they have a homosexual relationship or have a heterosexual relationship. We are all one. These minuscule details do not hinder anyone's relationship with their God or make them bad people. And if these people were true Christians they wouldn't be telling anyone that they are wrong. God, I believe, would like everyone to treat everyone else with respect and go about our daily lives filled with love and loving as we please.

Guitar king shreds Horse

By Joe Sullivan
Collegian Staff

DICK DALE
Iron Horse Music Hall
April 22

NORTHAMPTON — On Wednesday night, a black-clad, stratocaster-slinging Dick Dale took the stage at the Iron Horse to provide ample proof for why he is the undisputed King of the Surf Guitar.

Playing everything from his classics to newly-written acoustic jams, bantering with the audience, throwing out souvenir guitar picks to the crowd, and just flat out blowing the roof off the place, not only on guitar but also trumpet, the set was, as Dale himself would say, bitchin'.

The Massachusetts native's career began in the late '50s and reached epic proportions between 1961 and 1964, when this country was gripped by the West Coast phenomenon known as surf music. While developing the trademark sound, Dale was also one of the innovators in the area of electric guitar technology, pioneering the use of the reverb pedal and engineering amplification louder than anything that came before him.

Dale and his two bandmates, drummer Dusty Watson and bass player "Captain Ron," began the set with a warm-up that sounded a bit like an Allman Brothers jam and that couldn't have lasted more than a minute and a half, but the crowd was thrown into a frenzy nevertheless. In his subsequent numbers, Dale ripped through such classics as "Taco Wagon," which shows a real classical Spanish guitar influence, the Western outlaw sounding "Shake 'N Stomp," which did just that, and the bold, defiant, "Take It Or Leave It."

Dale took a bit of a pause to let the crowd know that he has recently been asked to play on top of Space Mountain as part of a Disney World anniversary celebration, that everyone should grab his anthology, Better Shred Than Dead, and that a new album Lord Of The Strat, will be out on the Grass Roots label. As Dale told the crowd, "I don't play on no wussy strings," referring to his use of strings a minimum of double the average thickness, he proceeded to wail out "Riders In The Sky," walking outside to play to a group of girls who were unable to get in, breaking into a full-on surf jam extravaganza in the process.

Out of his jam came a stuttering, maniacal rendition of Deep Purple's "Smoke On The Water," which broke into the "Peter Gunn Theme," and then back again to Deep Purple — the crowd loved it.

Dale slowed things down with "Fever," singing to two women at a stageside table, and then slowed things down even further by playing a three-song acoustic set on a Charles Fox-made, white, hollow-body guitar, which he said he had always wanted because Elvis played one. From the mini-set, the Brazilian-influenced "Dellahorazante" was beautiful, as was the Spanish-sounding "Desperanza."

Throughout the show, Dusty Watson's expression was shear terror as he attempted to keep up with Dale, and it seemed to get worse on the early "Let's Go Trippin'," which was played with more intensity than its original incarnation. Dale then surprised everyone by rocking out on trumpet for his next two songs, eventually using it to play the crowd- pleasing "Misrilou," most recently found on the Pulp Fiction Soundtrack.

After he told the crowd that musicians don't need to leave the stage for encores, the audience erupted, and Dale went on to play three more songs, including the new one "Lord Of The Strat," which was earth-shaking. The band finished with a flourish to a standing ovation, and rather than leaving the stage, Dale stayed behind to sign autographs for a crowd of about 30 people.

Bravo profiles essence of Björk

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Bravo wasn't looking for a cheap excuse to film a travelogue when it filled its profile of the singer Björk with breathtaking pictures of the primordial Icelandic terrain. Understanding Björk's native Iceland is an important prerequisite for understanding her.

When she returned home at the beginning of last year, Björk went for a nighttime walk where ice was thawing in the lava fields. The crackle of the ice and the Northern Lights above her filled her senses and inspired the striking sounds on her Homogenic album, an intriguing combination of strings and electronic beats. Iceland's terrain is otherworldly and Björk's music, flittingly enough, often sounds like it comes from an undiscovered planet. The Big Band-inspired "It's Oh So Quiet" is an apt example. Björk's voice swoops from childlike whispers to full-fledged shrieks and brilliantly captures the emotions of falling in and out, and in and out of love again.

The cable network Bravo, in a profile that premieres Sunday 8 p.m. EDT, followed the enigmatic artist from her debut as an 11-year-old singer of Icelandic folk songs to her days in the punk band Sugarcubes to her life in London and, finally, back home.

The 32-year-old musician is such a prized export that the documentary even seeks out the former president of Iceland to talk about her.

"You cannot say that Björk is common," said Vigdis Finnbogodottir, president from 1980 to 1996. "This personality is absolutely unique. The warmth, the major attitude toward life, mixed with the heart of a child. She has an Icelandic way."

The former president may not want to know where Björk was the night before she curled up on a chair in a Manhattan office to talk about the profile. She was fighting the effects of many hours spent drinking with friends and singing along loudly to whatever came on the jukebox.

"Other people have asked me to do this in the past, but I've never felt comfortable with it," Björk said. "Here, I really liked the people. I trusted them not to paint some glossy picture of me, to be truthful. There was a certain understanding of what I do, and I think that came across pretty well."

Documentary makers sought to celebrate her work at what was essentially the lowest point in her life.

She struggled with her role as a public figure when an obsessed American fan committed suicide after sending a letter bomb to Björk's home in London. The bomb was intercepted.

Björk also attacked a television camera crew in Bangkok when they took pictures of her in an airport with her son. Video of a crazed Icelandic woman coming after someone with fists flying is never particularly good for the image.

She hit an emotional bottom. "I've got a feeling that I won't go down there again," Björk said. She never questioned being a musician, but wondered if it was best to pursue it as a hermit or to get out there and live life.

"It was a question of, 'Wait a minute — am I spending the right amount of time on the right things here?'" she said. "It does make you wonder when, because of the job that you do, that there is a chance that your only child can be killed. Is this a pro-life statement?"

Anyone who knows her music can figure how this internal struggle played out.

Before performing at the Tibetan Freedom Concert in New York last year, Björk studied some books on Buddhism. Much of what she read felt right, but she sensed that the goal of many followers was to become so enlightened that they lived outside of their emotions and the normal ups and downs of life. And that rang false to her.

Isabel Allende: 'Age has not tamed me'

By Lisa J. Adams
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Isabel Allende had a disturbing dream.

She was speeding down the highway, about to hit a small child who was running toward her car. "I jammed on the brakes... picked up the child and woke up trembling," she said.

Allende, author of The House of the Spirits, has learned to pay attention to her dreams.

She awakened from a dream one morning in 1963 and knew that a few hours before she had gone to sleep, she had conceived a baby girl. Years later, she predicted the conception of her daughter-in-law's two children and the death of her daughter, Paula, who had been stricken with a rare hereditary disease. The latest dream was related to her work. On a month long tour to promote her new book, Aphrodite: A Memoir of the Senses, Allende has had scant time to work on a historical novel she started several months ago.

"My husband reminded me that... when I'm working, I dream of children and I realized... this is my work saying, 'It's time for me, pick me up. Save me,'" she said during a recent interview. Aphrodite also sprang from the fertile earth of Allende's nocturnal fantasies. On a night in January 1996, she dreamed she had jumped into a swimming pool filled with rice pudding. A week later, she said she dreamed that actor Antonio Banderas was naked — on a tortilla. The only way to deal with her obsessions was to write.

Dripping with lusty tales of food and its role in seduction, Aphrodite explores the history of aphrodisiacs dating back to Cleopatra. The queen of the Nile, we are told, applied honey and ground almonds both to beautify her skin and to inflame her lovers, Julius Caesar and Mark Antony.

The book includes recipes for both food and romance, but is neither a guide to cooking nor a handbook for carnal pleasures. Rather, it is a celebration of all the senses —taste, smell, sight, sound and touch — as well as a tribute to affection and intimacy.

"With saucers, as with love, you must be guided by intuition and not manuals," Allende advises.

Sprinkled throughout the book are tales of erotic encounters, the author's and those of other writers both ancient and contemporary.

For Allende, though, the book was more than an opportunity to revel in the joys of food and sex; it helped her escape a cavern of grief where she had languished for three years after her daughter's death.

"This book pulled me out of writer's block. It allowed me to go back to the craft of writing without the challenge of inventing fiction," the 55-year-old Allende said, her brown eyes soulful and calm.

The Chilean writer is sitting in a restaurant at Le Parker Meridien Hotel. She sips Earl Grey tea while responding to questions about Chile, her daughter and the power of dreams, language and love.

Small in size, she is a torrent of energy. It is only 11 a.m. but she has been up for five hours and has at least another 10 to go before the publicity chores of the day are done.

Her latest project, the historical novel, is still in its embryonic stage, and has been put on hold during the tour. But next month, Allende says she'll lock herself in a room and get to work. "And I know that I can just explore that dark place that the book is now and I will find something there."

Allende writes all of her books in Spanish and begins each one on Jan. 8, the auspicious date in 1981 that her life as a journalist began to give way to a new career as novelist.

Her grandfather Tata was dying in Chile, but Allende couldn't return to see him; she had left voluntarily two years after Gen. Augusto Pinochet seized power in a 1973 military coup. President Salvador Allende, Allende's second cousin, died during the takeover.

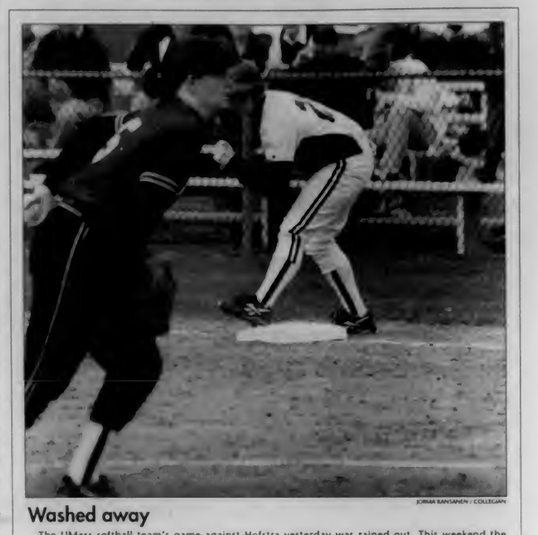
before, as a freshman, she poured in two goals and yet another assist.

The Wildcats have not been so lucky in the past, as the attack exploded for five goals and an assist in a 15-8 beating of UNH in 1997. A year earlier, Korutz complimented her assist with a hat trick against the struggling opponents.

In 1996, when Eagles' coach Mary Ann Foley took her current position, the team went 7-0 down the stretch, looking like a rebuilt squad to be reckoned with. However, last season Boston College didn't quite measure up, losing 11 of their 17 games, including a narrow 15-12 decision against UMass.

This time around, the game might not be so high-scoring from the Eagles' point of view because the Minutewomen have inserted two new goalies into the mix, freshmen Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi. Last year against Megan Haggerty, who was not a goalie by trade, BC made the game highly competitive.

On the other hand, the Eagles are returning nine of the starters responsible for that 12-point output, including Danielle Wood and Maggie Berkery.

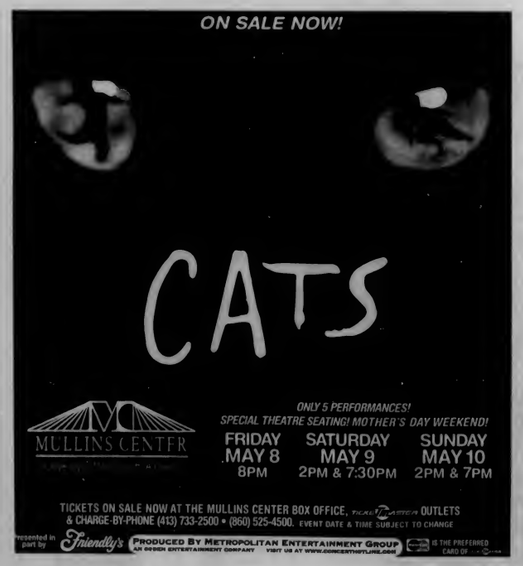


The UMass arsenal lost high scorer Stephanie Walsh and defensive standout Michele Warrington, but retains seniors Jen Herker and Jen Bowen, who with 18 points apiece were tied for third among returning players this season, and senior Amy Leder, who was second only by one to Warrington in ground balls in 1997. Of course, Korutz will also come along.

New Hampshire will be weary of the entire Minutewomen squad, on the other hand, as they suffered a 15-8 beating to UMass last year. The Wildcats have fewer returning starters than does Boston College, and fewer wins to build off of as well. However, neither team looks to roll over and die.

"They're both better now," coach Francesca McClellan said. "New Hampshire has won some great games, and BC is very competitive. We're prepared for a battle. We need to step up and play with confidence and ball-handle with confidence."

If the Minutewomen can win their remaining three games, they will reach the 10-win plateau for the first time since 1983, one year after they won the only national title in UMass athletic history. Total perfection is still the Massachusetts goal.



"We're looking for a good game from everybody," McClellan said. "We could be sharper. I'd love to see 60 minutes of sharp play. One of my players gave me a quote that said, 'Pursue perfection, but accept excellence.' So I always want that total 60 minutes."

Baseball cans Beanpot, heads to URI

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

The light rains speedily improved to a pelting pour on Fenway Park yesterday, just as the Massachusetts baseball team was warming up in the sprawling outfield in preparation for the Beanpot final with Harvard. The rematch of last year's meeting for the crown was eventually postponed until May 4 at 1 p.m.

In a way, it might have been a blessing as the Minutemen (22-9) suffered a crushing 21-8 loss to the Black Bears of Maine on Wednesday. Five UMass pitchers allowed 21 hits while combining for seven strike-outs. Nick Skirkanich accepted the loss as he evened his record to 1-1.

Muchie Dagliere continued his record-breaking consecutive hitting streak with two hits including a double, increasing the feat to 30 games. The second baseman leads the team with a batting average of .471. Shaun Skeffington hit his second round-tripper of the year, going 3-for-5 with two RBI. Centerfielder Doug Clark went 2-for-3 with an RBI and shortstop Seth Kaplan went 2-for-4.

This weekend the Minutemen head east to Rhode Island for a three-game series beginning tomorrow. As of April 18, the Rams were dancing on the table of mediocrity with a record of 17-18, 5-6 in the Atlantic 10. In their most recent contest on Wednesday, they dropped a close call to Quinnipiac, 9-8.

The Rhodys are led offensively by Rob Farrell who has connected for five homeruns while driving in a team-leading 41 RBI. Kevin Lanzilli tops the charts with a batting average of .383 while also powering five homers.

The Rams have been producing 7.4 runs per game while the Minutemen have averaged an A-10 leading 8.96 runs. UMass ranks first in batting average with an impressive .335 compared to Rhode Island's .315.

Bill Cocke has been the ace of the staff this season with a record of 6-1 in eight appearances. He is second on the team with 35 strikeouts in 48.2 innings. Junior Ryan Cameron has fanned a team-leading 45 batters.

After this weekend, the Minutemen have six games in the regular season left plus the Beanpot makeup. May 8-10 they head to Boyertown, PA for the A-10 Tournament. Last year UMass lost to Virginia Tech, 8-13 in the A-10 finals.

Minutemen Notes (as of April 14): Dagliere ranks third in the A-10 with an average of .444... Pete Gautreau leads the league in stolen bases per game, swiping .061 per game... Bill Cooke and Travis Veracka rank third and fourth, respectively, in ERA with averages of 2.59 and 2.70.

Women's track second in Atlantic 10 warmup

By Jana Bencsoter
Collegian Staff

While track and field is made up of individual events, this past weekend the members of the Massachusetts women's track team pulled together in each event to grab second place at a meet at the University of Connecticut.

At the meet, Brown received first place with a score of 150 points, UMass grabbed second with 112, Syracuse took third with a total of 106 points and UConn finished in fourth with 102. Also at the meet were Providence College (5th, 42 pts), the Rhode Island (6th, 37 pts) and Boston College (7th, 33 pts).

"Everyone on the team is training hard and competing well. We are getting ready for the Atlantic 10 competition," said co-captain Shana Mitchell.

Mitchell proved her words through her actions. She earned a first place for the Minutewomen in the hammer throw, 169 feet. With that record-setting throw, Mitchell also beat her throw from the last meet and qualified for NCAAs, making her the first woman to qualify in the hammer event for UMass. Mitchell also added a second place for the squad in the discus and in the process, setting another a personal record.

Other record-breakers this past weekend were Shelanda Irish and Silifa Kenku. Irish broke 19-feet, 9-inches in the long jump and placed first in the event — good enough for the school record. Irish also had her fastest time in the 200m dash, placing her 6th with a 25.07.

Kenku broke her own record in the 400m hurdles with a time of 61.21 seconds. Along with Mitchell, Kenku broke the mark within a week's time. Kenku took second place in the hurdles, as she was nipped by Adrienne Scherenzel from Syracuse.

Rosey Bryan finished first place for the squad in the triple jump. She placed third in the long jump with a jump of 18- feet, 3/4-inches, and came in fourth place in the 100m high hurdles with a time of 14.16 seconds.

The UMass squad grabbed most of its points in the second, third and even fourth place positions. Rebecca Donaghue finished in fourth place in the 800m run and the 1,500m run. Her time in the 800m run was 2:18.61 and in the 1,500 was 4:37.38. Along with Donaghue was Nicole Way, who placed fifth in the 1,500m run with a time of 4:39.29.

In the 3,000m, Christy Martin ran to a third place finish with a time 10:12.62 while teammate Sally Hirsch took fifth with a 10:15.53. Also in distance, Tracey Meagher came in third in the 5,000m run with a time of 18:03.75. Meagher took a remarkable 32 seconds off her previous time and had a personal record for the day — a feat which places Meagher fourth overall in the Atlantic 10. For the UMass squad, Liz Sheptyck also placed in the 5,000m run with a time of 20:17.80.

In the relays, the Minutewomen placed fourth and second. In the 4x100 relay, the team of Emma Gardiner, Raqeil Shelton, Anya Forest and Irish placed fourth with a time of 48.12. The 4x400 relay squad of Michelle Cooper, Andrea Comeau, Kenku and Irish placed second with a time of 3:49.36.

Carole LePlante' strong performance in the shot earned her second place with a throw of 40-feet, 9-inches. Also placing in the shot put was Alison Tostevin, who came in sixth place with a throw of 38-feet, 3-inches. LePlante placed fifth in the discus, while teammate Tostevin placed sixth grabbing more points for the UMass squad.

In the javelin, freshman Sharyn Harrison placed fourth, with a throw of 121-feet, 10-inches.

"This meet was very exciting. This was the first time in the past 10 years that we beat UConn. Syracuse was also a big win because we never see them unless we are at the ECAC. The women did an outstanding job in every event putting out strong competition," said coach Julie LaFreniere.

Virginia Tech is still favored for the Atlantic 10 competition, but the UMass squad is performing at a higher caliber.

"We like being the under-dog," Mitchell said.

There will be seven women performing at Penn Relays in Philadelphia, April 23-24. The seven women traveling are Irish, Mitchell, Donaghue, Forest, Bryan, Murphy and Comeau. This will be the next step in preparing the Minutewomen for the Atlantic 10 championships.

"That is our goal, to win the A-10 Championship," Mitchell said.

Minuteman lacrosse wants to scratch 18–year itch

Syracuse poses stiff challenge at Dome

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts men's lacrosse defenseman Harold Drumm is not thinking about the NCAA tournament at this point in the season.

Instead, his one–game–at–a–time mindset has him focused on the task at hand: Sunday's matchup with Syracuse at the Carrier Dome.

Before Drumm, or any of his teammates can set their sights on the postseason, they must face off in the 4 p.m. matchup against a team that has given the Minutemen fits for the last 18 years.

"I have never been on the winning side of a game against Syracuse," said coach Greg Cannella, who played against the Orangemen while a player at UMass. "I want to beat them very badly. We haven't had a win against them since 1981."

Drumm will play a key role in helping the Minutemen's cause. To no one's surprise, Drumm, one of the best defenders in the nation, draws the assignment of guarding Casey Powell, perhaps the nation's best player.

"He's the best player in college and probably the best in the world," Cannella said of Powell, who currently ranks first in the nation in points per game with 6.1. "He creates a tremendous amount of his own opportunities, but he's also an unselfish, team player."

UMass, however, can not simply focus on Powell alone. His younger brother, Ryan, who stands fourth in the nation at 5.0 points per game, and Devin Darcangelo join Casey to account for nearly 60 percent of the Orangemen's goals.

"We have to shut down the Pcwell brothers," Cannella said. "Actually, we have to limit them, I don't think anyone can shut them down."

While containing the Syracuse attack is the primary objective of UMass' defense, the offense will be working to the Orangeman goal at the other end of the field.

The Minuteman attack could either be facing Jason Gebhardt or Rob Mulligan in goal. Gebhardt had knee surgery at the beginning of the year and has shared time in front of the net with reserve Mulligan.

"I think the knee surgery affects his mobility," Cannella said. "Recently, it's started to wear on him. If he's in goal, it's important to go at him early.

"No matter what, our offense has to remain composed and poised," he said. "We have to play as little defense as possible. We have to finish our opportunities, particularly early."

Not that the Minutemen want to see a high–scoring affair. Indeed, the slower tempo UMass prefers lends itself to the Minutemen's favor. Syracuse has scored 13 or more goals in all but one contest this season. And its 10–tally output against Rutgers on April 11 was not good enough for a victory.

"We don't want to get into a shootout," Cannella said. "We will get some transition offense because of the way they play, and we'll have to take advantage of that when we have it.

"But I think the Rutgers game helps them," he continued. "I'm sure they've talked about that a lot lately, and I'm sure they don't want it to happen again."

What helps UMass is the 8–7 win the Minutemen earned at Notre Dame last Sunday. Not only did the win stop a three– game losing skid, it helped the team's confidence.

"This win means everything in terms of boosting our confidence," Drumm said after the game.

Also helping UMass in that win was the first quarter effort given by the offense. Five different players combined to lead the Minutemen to a 4–0 advantage before the Fighting Irish could score 14:18 into the game.

"That game helps us a lot, regardless of the score," Cannella said. "It helps that we played well, but we have to give a much more consistent effort."

Aller a symbol of improvement

Senior has guided men's tennis to new status with his steady play

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team has been built around courage under fire, and an intensity level that often outmatches anything else.

For four years, Alex Aller has often symbolized this style of play, and he has been a key component in putting the tennis program in the position it now finds itself.

Aller has seen the team improve from 9–10 in his freshman year to 14–7 this season. Perhaps the pinnacle was last season with a 16–3 mark and a New England championship.

This year, the team played against tougher competition, but Aller and his mates were clearly up to the challenge as evidenced at the Atlantic 10 tournament.

It was at the tournament in Blacksburg, Va. where Aller completed his heralded career, winning two singles matches and helping UMass to a 3–1 performance.

Aller, who hails from Peru, has always relied on emotional play combined with a methodic style on the court.

"I get a thrill out of competing," Aller said. I have always believed in being very emotional when I play, because that is the only way I know how."

Early this season, Aller was not sure if he still had his passion for tennis, and even contemplated sitting out the final season.

Massachusetts coach Judy Dixon helped convince Aller how valuable he was to the team and how sorely he would be missed.

"Coach Dixon has been so important to me ever since I came to UMass," Aller said. "She helped me get through tough times, and reminded me how much I loved tennis, and playing on the team."

Dixon taught Aller how to play tennis on the collegiate hard courts when he began at UMass. Coming from Peru, Aller's experience came on the clay courts.

Since his arrival, Aller moved up from No. 6 to No. 3 singles, where he played most of this year.

Aller's most successful year on the court came in the 1996–97 season, when he compiled a sensational 21–3 overall record, including 12–0 in doubles.

"Alex has really helped this program to continually improve," Dixon said. He is so focused, and has a real passion for winning."

Aller's attitude has not only made a mark on the coaching staff, but his teammates as well.

"It has been great playing with Alex," junior Rob Manchester said. "He has put so much time and effort into his game, and he has really inspired the rest of us to play hard every match."

"We have a great team here," Aller said. "It has been a pleasure playing with guys that really want to win, and more importantly, get along so well. We are like a family on and off the court."

Aller is a finance major and has plans to become an investment banker after graduation in May.

"UMass has really prepared me for the rest of my life, Aller said. "I have met great people, gotten a great education and I will certainly not forget the experience of playing on the team."

The team will now have to move on without one of its most energetic players, but Aller feels that the program will continue to move in the right direction.

"Coach Dixon has instilled the right attitude here," Aller said. "She is such a great motivator, and I'm sure they will be just fine without me.

"I hope to come back and see them do even better in the years to come," Aller said. I will sorely miss being a part of the team."

Women's lacrosse faces BC in pursuit of perfect game

The UMass women's lacrosse team will face off against Boston College tonight in Chestnut Hill.

By Seth Koenig

The city of Boston is a cultured one, and it is the biggest such entity in New England. Boston has boasted such bands as Aerosmith, The Mighty Mighty Bosstones and, well, Boston, and was the filming site for the recent block-buster hit Good Will Hunting.

And tomorrow evening at 7 p.m. at Alumni Stadium in Chestnut Hill (almost Boston), the area will host the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team for a game against Boston College. That will be followed by a Sunday afternoon affair at the University of New Hampshire.

UMass junior Laura Koruz has fond memories of both schools, as neither team has historically been able to contain her.

Last season against the Eagles, Koruz, who has lead the team in scoring since arriving at college, torched BC for three goals and an assist. The season

UMass hoops it up at 8th Haigis

The "Garbage Shots" team from Smith college and team "Super crunch" from UMass fight for a victory in the women's final of the "weekend warrior" division.

The eighth annual Haigis Hoopla three–on–three basketball festival, presented by the University of Massachusetts sport management program, took place on Saturday and Sunday, April 25 and 26 at the UMass Haigis Mall.

As part of a non–profit organization, the event was organized and operated by students within the sport management program, the Amherst Regional High School (ARHS) and local volunteers.

As senior sport management major Jason Cohen explained, "There was a lot involved with getting ready for this event. Led by a class of 28 students and two professors, we had to figure out budget costs, management, revenue and the structure for how this event would be run."

UMass student Zac Bohlen, a volunteer for Haigis Hoopla, felt that all the effort was a success. "A lot of hours were involved, but it all pays off because you learn a lot in the end," Bohlen said.

One thing students and spectators alike could not plan for was yesterday's rainy weather.

After completing play in 13 of the 21 divisions, event directors decided to postpone play of the remaining eight divisions.

On Sat., May 2, the 32 remaining teams will return to the Haigis Mall to complete the tournament. Players must check in at the Haigis Mall at 9:30 a.m.

"We are always concerned with safety first. We considered the playing surfaces and the weather forecast to reach our decision, event director doctor Carol Barr said. "The last thing we wanted to see was an injury."

Despite yesterday's rainy weather, the tournament was still a success.

As the largest three–on–three basketball festival in Western Massachusetts, the event attracted a record high of more than 490 teams including an unprecedented record of 54 women's teams. This year's tournament not only features a surge in the number of participants, but also a larger geographic draw than ever before. Some teams traveled from all over New England and the United States, including players from Texas, Louisiana, South Carolina and North Carolina.

Sponsors for the event consisted of New Balance, Coca– Cola, Volkswagen, Bueno Y Sano and Pizza Hut. The two– day event included a slam dunk contest, Men's and Women's Legend Games, basketball clinics and the chance to win a Volkswagen Jetta.

The morning highlight event included the UMass Women's Basketball team hosting a basketball clinic for younger children.

Derrick Smith of Springfield had the opportunity to play with the Minutewomen. "It's the greatest experience of all to learn that it's not all about winning, but just having fun," Smith said.

"We like doing stuff like this. It gives us a chance to interact with the kids so that they can actually talk to us and get to know us better," said Minutewomen player Tee Krafi.

Other participants like Jeff Matuszko were just out to have a good time. "I hope to hit the money from downtown, but I also just want to have some fun," he said.

Local participants such as Owen Mullin and Andrew Lattuca from ARHS commented on the diverse background of participants.

"It's a great thing for local businesses to bring people from diverse backgrounds to see UMass and Amherst," Mullin said.

UMass sophomore Deryck Tuttle from "Da Snypaz" was excited to be participating in Haigis for the first time. "I woke up early this morning and found that we didn't have to play till 1 p.m., but I'm still really excited to be playing because I couldn't last

"Bounce" raises funds for research

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

On Saturday April 25, the University of Massachusetts Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity chapter took part in the nationwide "Bounce For Beats" campaign at Haigis Hoopla to raise money for the benefit of the Pediatric AIDS Foundation research and to help support families struggling with the AIDS virus.

The fraternity brothers asked UMass community members and residents from surrounding towns to sponsor them during their 24 hour ball–bouncing endeavor for AIDS research.

Sigma Alpha Mu has been a UMass chapter since 1989 and now boasts 69 members. The fraternity takes part in the yearly national philanthropy along with other 69 chapters in the "Bounce For Beats" campaign. Their goal for this year's Haigis Hoopla event was to raise $1,000 for the Pediatric AIDS Foundation.

Funds from the event will go to AIDS research and assist families in dealing with medical bills and counseling for those involved with the struggle.

Jason Sidman and Michael Rosenberg, co–philanthropy chairs to the chapter, expressed their feelings on the positive outcome of the event. "We're very excited about this as a tradition of Haigis Hoopla for years to

Voters cast ballots in Russian elections

KRASNOYARSK, Russia (AP) — Russia's former security chief, Alexander Lebed, was locked in a tight race yesterday for governor of a Siberian region, a post he wants as a platform for a presidential run.

With 10 percent of the votes counted in the Krasnoyarsk region, incumbent Gov. Valery Zubov was leading Lebed by 46 percent to 37 percent. A Communist candidate was running a distant third. There will be a runoff within two weeks if no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote.

Turnout was heavy, at 61 percent of eligible voters. Lebed, a retired general, wasn't among them — as a resident of Moscow, he wasn't qualified.

Elections were also held yesterday in the northern Russian republic of Karelia, where voters were to choose their new president, and in Smolensk in western Russia, where six people were competing for the governor's post.

National attention focused on Krasnoyarsk.

Pre–election polls had put Zubov ahead, but most observers thought the race had tightened in the final week.

Spacecraft uses Venus' gravity

PASADENA, Calif. (AP) — The Cassini spacecraft came so close to Venus yesterday that it was able to add another 16,300 mph to its own velocity, shortening its scheduled trip to Saturn.

The international space mission of NASA, the European Space Agency and the Italian Space Agency passed within 176 miles of Venus yesterday morning, completing a "gravity assist" in which Cassini uses a planet's gravity like a slingshot.

"All indications are that the spacecraft did exactly what we expected," said Ronald Draper, deputy program manager at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena.

A second Venus "gravity assist" is set for June 24, 1999, followed by a close pass of Earth in August 1999 and another past Jupiter in 2000. Each will add speed to allow Cassini's arrival at Saturn on July 1, 2004.

Cassini, now moving at 87,000 mph, was launched in October for a seven-year, 2.2 billion-mile trip. The plutonium-powered spacecraft will spend four years exploring Saturn, its rings and frozen moons. It's carrying the European Space Agency's Huygens probe, which will land on Titan, the largest of those moons.

A radar system eventually will produce images of Titan, the only moon in the solar system with a thick nitrogen atmosphere like Earth's.

Orchard Hill lounges closed due to increased vandalism

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Orchard Hill Residential Area has begun to shed its peaceful image as judicial sanctions are rising for violations concerning lounge balconies.

Reports of objects such as couches, chairs, firecrackers, beer bottles and cigarette butts being thrown off the balconies has increased steadily over the past year.

Numerous solutions are being discussed to curb the vandalism, one of which is a final option of breaking off the balconies entirely. Another alternative may include students having their room key unlock the door to the lounge located on the floor they live on.

Lounge doors are usually locked on weekend nights when the residential area tends to get noisier, but they are frequently kicked in. This makes it hard for Resident Assistants to monitor who is on the balconies and when. Wood frames may be replaced with metal ones if these problems persist.

"I consider [the balconies] to be a problem because when people get rowdy I can't use the lounge," said Orchard Hill resident Mark Lin, of the lounge locking policy.

Currently, according to University of Massachusetts policy, any object, including cigarette butts, being thrown off a balcony is cause for housing relocation.

Ryan Berry, a sophomore Orchard Hill resident, was judicially sanctioned this semester for throwing water balloons off a Field Residence Hall balcony, but has been able to find other alternatives to relocation as punishment.

SGA candidates to talk about campus issues

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Students will have a chance to hear candidates for University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) president and student trustee discuss campus wide issues during three debates tonight.

The first debate, scheduled to begin at 6 p.m. will be an Asian Latino African Native American (ALANA) students roundtable meeting at the Asian American Cultural Center in the Worcester Dining Commons.

This debate is being held for all ALANA RSO members and is not open to the public. Only the four SGA presidential candidates, Jennifer Casasanto, Dan Parker, Amy Pellegrino and Salwa Shamapande, will be present at the debate and each candidate will be asked three questions by the moderator. Questions will also be allowed from RSO members.

At 7 p.m. the second debate sponsored by the Silent Majority, a group who produces the conservative Minuteman newspaper, will begin in Campus Center room 801.

During the debate, the SGA candidates will be questioned by the moderator and students. In addition there will be cross debate between the candidates.

Finally, the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy (SCERA) will sponsor the third debate, scheduled to begin at 8 p.m. in the Student Union Colonial Lounge.

During the SCERA debate, students will be allowed to ask the candidates questions, in addition to answering three questions written by SCERA members which are related to campus wide issues. The candidates will also be allowed to ask each other one question and a follow up.

Both the Silent Majority and SCERA debates are open to the UMass community.

Chancellor of Elections Seth Presser hopes the debates will increase voter turnout to the SGA elections on April 29 and 30.

"I am hoping to get as many students voting as last time if not more. I am somewhat worried about voter turnout but I think the students will come through in the end," Presser said.

At least five percent of the student population must vote for the elections to be valid. If less than five percent of students vote the elections will be thrown out and new elections will have to be held.

In addition to the four presidential candidates, Eleanor Court, Erik Hansen and Jeffrey Howe are running for student trustee.

Students will be able to vote in all Dining Commons. Commuter students will be able to vote at either the Newman Center or the Campus Center Concourse. The polling places will be open on April 29 and 30 from 11 a.m.– 2 p.m. and 4–7 p.m.

Ray's funeral debated

By Vicki Brown
Associated Press

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The family of James Earl Ray, the convicted killer of Martin Luther King Jr., wants to hold a public funeral at a black church in the city where the civil rights leader was assassinated.

His brother hopes King's relatives, who believe Ray was not responsible for the 1968 killing, would attend a Memphis funeral. "It will be a memorial to James to show he done 30 years for a crime that he didn't commit," Jerry Ray said Saturday in a telephone interview from his home in Smartt, Tenn.

The Rays want to hold the funeral at Centenary United Methodist Church, a 650-member black church. The Rev. Herbert Lester, minister at the church, said yesterday he had not spoken to anyone about the planned funeral, but said, "I'd be open to talking about it."

A spokeswoman for the King family did not return a telephone message yesterday seeking comment on their possible attendance. Ray, 70, died in Nashville Thursday from liver disease. Though Ray plead guilty to killing King and avoided the death penalty, he recanted his confession and maintained his innocence until the time of his death.

Funeral services will be conducted by the Rev. James Lawson, who invited King to speak to striking sanitation workers in Memphis in 1968. It was during that visit that King was fatally shot on a motel balcony. Lawson is a former pastor of Centenary United. Ray supporters, including the King family, wanted his guilty plea thrown out so he could go to trial.

King's widow, Coretta, who believes her husband was the victim of a murder conspiracy and not a lone gunman, has promised to continue pushing for a fuller investigation of the assassination.

year," Tuttle said.

Many participants and crowds of people commented on the windy weather, but as parent Kathy Nadeau of Chicopee said, "the competition has been good, and it gives students a chance to enjoy playing together with different ages."

The highlight of the afternoon consisted of a Women's Legends Game, in which past alumni and Minutewomen players were matched up against the present UMass Minutewomen's team.

Former Minutewomen player and 1997 UMass graduate Beth Kuzneski was just one of the players from that division that participated in the legend game.

"It was a great atmosphere in playing with some of my old teammates, but there was something special about it and was almost like a reunion for us," Kuzneski said.

A slam-dunk competition was another event that attracted hundreds to watch as players competed for their ability to perform dunks of various difficulty.

Lori Waldorf, a representative of Hoopla sponsor New Balance, was pleased with the success of the event.

"It's very important to get involved with a lot of 'grass- root' marketing because it's an educational tool for students, it benefits the local community," Waldorf said of the tournament, but ultimately added, "it's a memorable experience that's all about having fun."

Canadian prime minister in Cuba to build nation's ties

By John Rice
Associated Press

HAVANA — With U.S. efforts to isolate Cuba flouted by its friends and foes alike, Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretien headed to Havana yesterday to build on his nation's growing ties with the communist-ruled island.

Chretien is one of the most important Western leaders to visit Cuba in years. His trip comes amid a string of victories in Cuba's efforts to break out of a U.S.-backed diplomatic isolation. Canada, like many European and Latin American nations, favors a path of "constructive engagement," arguing that persuasion will be more effective in bringing change in Cuba.

"Of course we will raise the question of human rights and political rights," Chretien said before departing, according to the Canadian Press.

"Isolation leads nowhere. But if we are engaging them, discussing with them, offering help...the people of Cuba and the president of Cuba will certainly be happy to have a dialogue." U.S. officials disagree. But Canadian leaders insist the visit will have little impact on relations with the United States. "They understand that we have a different position," Canada's Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy said last week.

Chretien will arrive at a symbol of Canada's growing role in Cuba: a Canadian-financed terminal at Havana's Jose Marti International Airport.

Canada rivals Italy as the largest supplier of foreign tourists to Cuba's famed beaches.

Its Sherritt International is the most prominent foreign company active in Cuba, with stakes in nickel mining, farming, cellular telephones and tourism. The company's executives have been banned from the United States in retaliation for use of mineral mines expropriated from U.S. companies after Fidel Castro's 1959 revolution.

Cuba has long been one of the most visible points of difference between Canada and the United States.

In 1976, then-Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau visited Cuba and infuriated anti-communists with a cry of "Viva Castro."

Canada and Mexico — the two U.S. partners in the North American Free Trade Area — are the only countries in the Americas that never broke relations with Cuba.

Several Latin American and Caribbean countries have re-established ties with Havana since the end of the Cold War and the disappearance of Cuban-backed efforts to foment revolution abroad.

come," Rosenberg said.

The UMass chapter of Sigma Alpha Mu will be participating in two other philanthropy events. In the future, they will be focusing on a program titled "Adopt A Highway," in which they will dedicate a day to cleaning up route 116.

The other event in which they are looking forward to being a success is the "Sammy Seatbelt Day." This day will consist of efforts to visit the UMass community and surrounding areas, in goal of stressing to people the importance of buckling up. This is an important event for the fraternity, because one of their brothers, Dennis Dallal, passed away a few years ago in an automobile accident.

As Jason Sidman said, "we think it's important to give to the community in a day and age where fraternities are frowned upon and to provide the communities with an educational experience that is beneficial."

Penn. teacher killed in teen shooting

By Geof Becker
Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Like school shootings elsewhere around the nation, warnings apparently were ignored before a 14-year-old boy — nicknamed "Satan" by a friend — killed a science teacher and wounded three other people.

"It is eerie that this is repeating itself," said Dr. Burt Singerman, director of psychiatry at St. Francis Medical Center in Pittsburgh.

"I really think this has occurred enough times that teachers, principals and guidance counselors need to think about how they would handle students who make these statements about wanting to hurt people."

In the small northwest Pennsylvania town of Edinboro, 14-year-old Andrew Wurst opened fire at an eighth-grade dance late Friday, killing one teacher and slightly wounding a second teacher and two teen-age boys, police said.

The violence followed school shootings last month in Jonesboro, Ark., in December in West Paducah, Ky., and last October in Pearl, Miss. The toll from all four shootings: 11 killed and 25 wounded. About a month ago, Wurst told classmates he wanted to kill people and commit suicide, said friends Triston Lucas, 14, and Ben Mills, 13.

"He had a really sick sense of humor," said Lucas.

Neither boy accepted the threats at face value.

"He would, like, laugh when he said it: 'I'm going to go to the dinner dance and kill some people,'" Lucas said Saturday in Edinboro.

Mills said he had nicknamed Wurst "Satan" about five months ago because Wurst was a fan of rocker Marilyn Manson and his dark music.

According to the two boys, Wurst said he was unhappy at home and became obsessive about girls.

"He hated his life. He hated the world. He hated school," Mills said. "The only thing that would make him happy was when (a girl he liked) would talk to him."

At a news conference yesterday morning, Edinboro police refused to discuss Wurst's motive. They said they were still investigating classmates' reports that Wurst had talked of killing and suicide. One of the teens accused in the Arkansas killings talked about shooting people the day before he did, but fellow students didn't take him seriously. The 14-year-old accused of shooting into a prayer circle in West Paducah warned friends to stay away from the gathering. And in Mississippi, the five teens charged with murder allegedly conspired to take over the school and kill their enemies, authorities have said.

Only after the shootings in Jonesboro and West Paducah did officials there begin talking about how to prevent them from happening. In Arkansas, schools are getting brochures with tips on spotting potentially violent students. Kentucky officials have suggested installing a telephone line to get tips from students about potential problems.

"One of the things that parents need to do, I think, is tell their kids that if they hear anything about a kid even joking around about having a weapon, that has to be taken seriously and reported to an adult immediately," said Janet Riggs, who teaches at Gettysburg College.

"I think if somebody is talking about it, you take it seriously. Something is wrong. Something is bothering the child," Singerman said.

"The solutions lie in the family dwelling, they don't lie in the government, the school or the psychologist's office. And I don't think they lie in the church either," said Dr. Paul Friday, chief of clinical psychology at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center at Shadyside Hospital.

Wurst was charged as an adult with criminal homicide, aggravated assault and reckless endangerment, and gun and drug charges. He had a small amount of marijuana, police said.

At a memorial service yesterday for slain teacher John Gillette, sympathy cards for both him and the Wurst family adorned the entrance of First Evangelical Lutheran Church.

The Rev. Robert Schmidt urged his congregation to avoid blaming anyone.

"Some of us came to Edinboro to escape the large city. We all have that false sense of security that we are in a rural part of the state, so we are safe," he said. "While we are angry, let us remember not to project it at anyone else or at any one group."

"I do consider [balconies] to be a problem, but not as serious as the Orchard Hill Residence Directors think. The rule was made to stop people from throwing couches off [balconies]. I didn't think it was such a big problem until we got in trouble," Berry said.

Berry, as well as roommate Nick Jungbluth, also a sophomore, did not know of the policy until getting in trouble for the water balloons.

"People throw stuff off [balconies] everyday; usually cigarette butts or an apple core. I can understand how the Residence Director can get upset. It's an annoyance," Jungbluth said.

"Honestly, people should be responsible enough to know not to throw things off the balconies, but housing directors should make it clearer to students," Jungbluth said.

As part of his judicial sanction, Berry has made flyers and posted them around the residential area informing students of the dangers and consequences of throwing objects off the balconies.

"We've made flyers stating the rules because we had no idea about the rules ourselves, so the same stuff won't happen to other people. We didn't mean to hurt anyone, we were just having fun," Berry said.

According to the Code of Student Conduct, cause for judicial action includes "endangering the safety of persons (self or others) or property or any action that might lead to loss of life or serious physical harm to others including but not limited to throwing objects or dropping objects from buildings, window sills or balconies."

Grayson/Field Residence Director Gisella Zuniga was unavailable for comment.

The dangers of addiction

"Hey, you gotta dip." "Can I get a lipper?" "I need some nicotine." What does this mean? These are the words of addicts of the worst drug there is, besides heroin.

People who say the above are chewers of smokeless tobacco. Skoal, Redman and Copenhagen, these are the names of some of the most popular smokeless tobacco brands.

We all know how nicotine and tobacco is glorified in the advertisement media, but what people don't know is that it is as addictive as heroin and five times as addictive as cocaine. Every dip you throw in your mouth, or every chew has three times more nicotine in it than one cigarette, according to USA Today Baseball Weekly (April 8-14).

> "What people don't know is that it is as addictive as heroin, and five times as addictive as cocaine."
> Paul Teves

This is an issue about which most people will say, "What is he talking about?" There are many people on this campus that have this nasty addictive habit. Probably more then you think.

The National Cancer Institute reports that there are 30,300 new cases of voice box cancer every year of which 8,000 will be fatal. They also report 10,800 new cases of mouth cancer, of which 2,300 will result in death.

How do people get started dipping, you ask? For young athletes it's the same old story. The baseball players that young boys idolize are doing dip or chew so they begin doing it in high school, some even younger. Many do it because their friends do it as an alternative to smoking — after all, athletes don't smoke. Some kids even have it introduced to them by their parents.

As you may or may not know, dip and chew are very closely related to our favorite American pastime, baseball. Let's analyze then some real life cases.

First there is Cincinnati Reds pitcher Pete Harnisch. He went through a public bout with depression and this condition was directly linked with his effort to quit dipping. He started dipping when he was 13 years old.

Retired Dodgers outfielder Brett Butler had an operation to remove a cancerous tumor, which was directly related to his chewing smokeless tobacco. He chewed for five years.

This spring training, nine Major League clubs were tested voluntarily. The study showed that of the 141 who were tested 83 of them had either lesions or soft tissue damage in their mouth. Fifty-nine percent of the dippers that were tested had damage to their mouths as a direct result of smokeless tobacco.

One of those players was Philadelphia Phillies ace hurler Curt Schilling. His lesions were serious enough to require a biopsy. Doctors told Schilling that it wasn't cancerous but if he didn't quit soon, it would develop into cancer.

The Phillies ace then proceeded to take all his tins and cans and dump out what ever dip he had left, and quit right there on the spot. Schilling had dipped 10 hours a day for 16 years, and now it is over.

Meanwhile other players don't seem to be disturbed by these finds. Atlanta Braves third baseman Chipper Jones has been dipping since he was 13. He states he gets tested twice a year, and he dips twice a day. He also explained that he moves the dip around as so not to affect the same spot all the time. He hopes it will be alright.

Jones knows as well as anyone that the things he told Baseball Weekly are just rationalizations for continuing dip. Jones has convinced himself that the drug isn't that bad — but that's a key sign of addiction.

Some major leaguers dip with drinks, while some dip with dinner. This brings us to our last baseball case. Bill Tuttle, former major leaguer with Kansas City, has had the full experience of chewing tobacco. He was famous for always having the biggest wads of chew in his mouth, kind of like Wade Boggs early in his career. For the last couple of seasons, Tuttle has been touring spring training camps and talking about the evils of smokeless tobacco. He couldn't make it this year because he's home dying a gruesome death.

Tuttle can't speak or taste and can barely hear. These conditions are due to Tuttle's five major operations on his face and throat. Half his face has eroded away due to cancer, and he also had a skin transplant from his chest to his face. He undergoes 22 daily radiation treatments. This is no way for anyone to live their live.

Dipping smokeless tobacco is also spreading into other sports such as football, whose most famous dipper is Dallas Cowboys quarterback Troy Aikman. It has spread to tennis, hockey and even women's sports.

Listen, quit while you can, and don't convince yourself it's Ok, like Chipper Jones has. Typical excuses include: "I'll quit this summer." "Oh, my girlfriend wants me to quit, so I will." "Once I get out of college, I'll stop." But remember when you said that you would quit after high school?

Don't keep making up all these excuses to keep dipping after I have just given you every excuse to quit. Take it from me — I lived with this addiction for five years before I quit. After all, doesn't everyone really want to quit?

It's not easy to quit, but take it from me, success is the greatest feeling in the world. Just ask Schilling, Butler and Harnisch. I'd tell you to ask Bill Tuttle or maybe former major leaguer Bill Leslie who is dying at 30 without a jaw from oral cancer, but neither of them would be able to respond to you, because they both have lost the ability to speak.

Cartoon communication

If you've read the papers lately, you'll know Teletubbies are the next big thing. "Teletubbies," the English hit kid's television show (their answer to "Barney"), is due to appear on PBS this spring. The characters are four brightly colored, felt-costumed creatures with television screens in their abdomens and antennae projecting from their heads. Their faces, permanently grinning, vaguely resemble those of albino mice. "Benign," most Americans would think (before turning to more important matters such as: "Who is Cartman's father?"). But no — Teletubbies are the stuff of grave controversy.

To the British, language is sacred, particularly their language. Therefore, to those posh Britons, Teletubbies represent all that is evil about colonials (Americans, Australians, etc.) and the lower classes: they speak corrupted English. To be specific, they speak baby talk. Gurgles, lisps and slurred words are standard in the scripts, and in fact are presented with more flair than in, say, your average pub. Some experts have led an outcry that Teletubbies are teaching baby Brits bad English. In fact, these experts have a point — effective communication is essential to society. To take it a step closer to home, communication is especially important to students who live in the Happy Valley, because we tend to assume everyone is on the same wavelength, when in reality, our antennae could be tuned to totally different stations.

Tanya Mannes

In fact, last Friday I had a particularly memorable communication gap while walking the streets of Northampton. Two of my old high school friends were visiting, so we hit Club Metro (briefly), and then Fire and Water. I wore shiny pants and platforms, and one friend whom I will call "Jess," wore fishnets, knee-high boots and a leather top. Her boyfriend, "Mark," wore baggy pants and a t-shirt. On our way up Main Street to my car, around the area of JavaNet, two girls walked past us and said, "Twenty dollar whore."

Jess responded with a terse "Fifteen dollar whore." They yelled some challenge back.

Mark felt he had to be tough, so he turned toward them to make his point. Too bad he did not have the skills to back up his words. The next thing I knew, a skinny, angry, hooded sweatshirt-wearing "tough girl" was pushing him up against a brick wall. Her boyfriend appeared and said to Mark: "You messing with my girl? You messing with my girl?"

Feeling responsible, I tried to make peace. I said, "There's no problem. Why don't you let him go? There's no problem." A short, corpulent girl pushed me with a grin and said, "Step."

The skinny girl turned her energy on me next. "Did you call me a (censored)? You defending your man? You call me a (censored)?" She punched me in the face, twice. I started to walk away with my friends, clutching my nose, the girls and their friends followed us. Mark, Jess and I ducked into a building and actually entered someone's apartment, unwittingly. The twenty-something residents, unruffled, gave me ice for my nose, and let me use their phone to call the police.

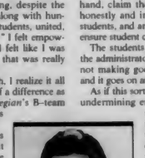
An officer appeared on foot, and immediately recognized the girls from Mark's description. He found the two girls, and walked them over to where we were waiting. "Are these the girls?"

I said yes. They had changed clothes, removing their sweatshirts. They stood, tense, in tank tops on that chilly night. The officer wrote up a report and advised me to fill out a complaint form on the next business day. He said, "She's got an attitude problem and we've dealt with her before. I'd arrest her in a second. But since it's a simple assault and battery, no weapon this time, I can't." (emphasis added). The officer walked me and my chastened friends back to my car.

I suppose I must be knifed in the center of Northampton before anyone gets arrested. In any case, the officer was as helpful as he could be within the constraints of his job. But did the situation, with the resulting injury to my delicate nose, have to take place?

Last Friday I learned two things. The first: Not everyone, even in the utopian Valley, is on the same channel. I guess the Teletubbies were right all along: with their gurgles and baby talk, they still communicate far better than a few tough girls and a few out-of-town club kids in Northampton. The second: Speak softly, and carry a big stick.

Tanya Mannes is a UMass student



One year after...

Goodell, Goodell, what has become of you?

A year ago I stood in front of the Goodell Building, despite the bitter chill, chanting along with hundreds of others, "the students, united, will never be defeated!" I felt empowered, I felt righteous, I felt like I was involved in something that was really making a difference.

In retrospect, though, I realize it all made about as much of a difference as the presence the Collegian's B-team made in the Haigis Hoopla tournament.

What the students inside Goodell fought for was to get the school to ensure that 20 percent of the undergraduate and 15 percent of the graduate student bodies would be minority, and to provide more financial and educational assistance to lower class students and students with children.

Paul Hayes

Myself and many other students, however, saw it as a great big unity rally, where all sorts of people and classes could come together. The crowd eventually became a gathering of support for such vague sentiments as apologism and anti-administrationism. At the time I was quoted in a Collegian story as describing the takeover as "a noble cause."

I think the French Revolution was first described in a similar way, before the guillotine was rolled into the public square.

Over 12 months later, the thrill is gone and the promise that emerged with the students at the end of the takeover has yet to be realized.

The takeover ended with the administration committing itself to fulfilling 21 of the students demands. The progress of these 21 commitments, called the Living Document, has been slow. Students still involved claim the plans for the Living Document's fulfillment are deliberately being left unclear by University administrators.

The administrators, on the other hand, claim they have been dealing honestly and in good faith with the students, and are doing all they can to ensure student commitments are met.

The students have further accused the administrators of lying to them, of not making good on their promises, and it goes on and on.

As if this sort of aftermath were not undermining enough, reaction from students who were not involved in the takeover further detracts from anything the takeover set out to accomplish.

"The takeover was a joke," one person said after being asked their opinion. "They just wanted to skip class."

"It didn't affect me," another person said.

"I need another cause like I need a hole in the head," yet another said.

Many of the protestors made speeches during the takeover, referring to the administrations past misdoings of the students, going back to the 1980s. A friend of mine said "It's only a four year program. These people should just take their diploma, get out of here, and move on."

I myself have grown more cynical about the true value of the Goodell takeover and the resulting commitments. I wonder if some student demands aren't asking the school to spread itself too thin.

I began my UMass life as an English major, and English is just one of the departments which has been decimated in recent years. Before his retirement, one of my former English professors, Normand Berlin, said this school could have been the best school in the East — "We were so close," he said.

I wonder if these commitments will get us any closer.

In addition to what I've already mentioned, the commitments also push for a number of minority studies classes, and the diversification of a number of faculty and administrative positions.

I have little problem with the administrative and faculty diversification, which are essentially affirmative action-type programs. I feel that if there is an increase in minority students, there should be an increase in corresponding administration and support groups on campus. But the classes?

The question is, is it the school's responsibility to teach people about diverse cultures, or the job of the individual? As it is, classes as a whole all teach diverse content, are historically accurate and highly culturally aware in most departments. The University offers a number of classes that delve into cultural issues in departments including history, English, comparative literature, anthropology, etc. Do we need a Native American studies program? Is it going to address needs not met by a history or BDIC major?

Or will it serve to thin out the financial and talent pools of the University? I see the importance of continuing to keep a culture alive through education. I feel to not do so would be tantamount to genocide.

Is it the University's place to make up for cultural omission, or is it the job of the families of, and those concerned with, the various racial and ethnic communities to ensure their histories and legacies live on?

Over a year later, students accuse the administration of not following through on its promises. The administration claims they are doing the best they can to fulfill the Living Document and say that students are micromanaging. Neither side can agree, and all those days spent shivering in the cold cheering on the protestors seem as if they were a lifetime ago. The thrill is most definitely gone.

Plight of a people: we shall not conform

It seems that there are people out there who have a problem with the two clenched, raised fists which are displayed on top of our Black Affairs page.

I'm sure there are a good number of people out there who feel that the raised fist is "inappropriate."

The raised fists represents Black Power, and it represents upliftment of all our people — all over the world. Why do I feel that this symbol is appropriate?

It is appropriate because the fist represents power in a manner which shows emotions, aggression and initiative. The raised fist is an appropriate symbol because it is not passive and conforming to white standards.

For hundreds of years, whites have tried to instill in us a feeling of internal depression and suppression, a feeling and belief that we as a Black Nation may not and cannot express our passions and emotions in a way which threatens their power and control. They have spent hundreds of years killing us, destroying our minds, raping us of our culture and dividing us, and now when we display a sign of positive emotion and self-empowerment, it is deemed "inappropriate."

White society are so emersed in the belief that black people are a minority people, a Negro people, a people who can survive only under their colonial rule, that they see it as audacious when blacks do not conform to their "norm."

To all of the folks who haven't realized it yet, black people are rising. We are taking our futures into our own hands; we will no longer allow ourselves nor our children to become the "colonies" of any white nation.

Edgar A. Barros

Yes, we are raising our fists against all those who are trying to oppress us. We will no longer negotiate peacefully for years and years and years. We are demanding control of our lives, communities and our futures. In the same way that the white Americans fought and struggled for their rights as people in 1776, we are willing to fight for our rights as people, we will fight for our rights as people.

Why is the fist inappropriate?

Those whites who feel threatened by the fist are those whites who still carry this mentality of superiority, which has been passed down from generation to generation in the same manner which you pass down family genes. To those people I say, shed yourself of these evil genes, we are people also.

The raised fist is not a symbol of racism or exclusion. The raised fist is not similar to the swastika, it is not similar to the burning cross, and it is not similar to the UMass minuteman. Black people have never used the raised fist while burning down churches, while throwing folks into gas chambers, while enforcing Jim Crow laws, or while miseducating young minds. The only thing that the raised fist has been associated with is black empowerment and unity, and we will continue to use this symbol as such.

If you are not black and are interested in learning more about black people and black culture, talk to friends or do some research.

If you are interested in hearing some of the views and concerns of black people on campus, then read the Black Affairs page, but keep in my that our page is in no way catered to whites. We will not conform our ideas, views, beliefs, theories and/or values to any white standard. We will no longer view ourselves and measure our expectations through the eyes of the white man. We are our own people and will fight as a people.

> "We are demanding control of our lives, communities, and our futures."

Re-activism: too little, too late

You try and pretend you don't see him as you walk by, but you can't help but hear him.

He looks terrible. His beard and hair are overgrown and dirty. His teeth are a dark yellowish-brown and his face is oily. The blue jeans he's wearing are ripped and torn, but at least they aren't as dirty as his green, sweat stained t-shirt with the words "Jesus Saves" across the chest.

He's loud, real loud, and he's shouting with everything he's got, because he really, really believes that he's the product of some big government plot to keep him poor.

People are whisking by him, this way and that, going about their everyday business like he isn't even there. You tell yourself that's what you're going to do, but you don't.

You try not to look at him, but he's just so loud that you have to turn you're head. That's where you make your first mistake, because he sees you and you see him. Eye contact has been established and now he knows he's got an audience: you.

So, he starts getting even louder and he knows you hear him, because he saw you look at him.

He saw you look at him.

Every word coming from his mouth is hitting you like lead pipe. It's not that they necessarily mean anything to you, but it's annoying. This guy just won't shut up. He just keeps yelling and yelling and yelling until, finally, you're out of ear-shot.

Sure, you could give two rocks about what the guy was saying, but he had your attention. He made you look at him and made the brief time it takes to walk past someone on the street seem like an eternity. It sucks that you have to endure that sometimes, but you shake it off. Yes, he was loud enough to annoy you, but you realize how silly you are for even getting upset. He made a lot of noise, but his noise didn't change anything. Sure, he got to you, but he'll still be poor tomorrow. All that noise and no change. For a minute, you feel bad for him. Three minutes later, you've forgotten him.

In more ways than one, the majority of the Black Community (here and across the globe) is like the man on the street who makes a lot of noise, but doesn't change a thing.

Humphrey brown III

The problem isn't in what we're saying, but when and how we say it. Today, it seems that we've forgotten what it means to be activists and have become re-activists.

We always find ourselves on the receiving end of racism, discrimination, hatred and bigotry. It's only after something happens, do we choose to do something about it. We don't organize before we're wronged. We organize after if at all. It's always us reacting to them. The oppressed reacting in a fit of buss and fuss to the terrible actions of the oppressor. If we continue to move in these circles, we'll never really get anywhere. Why do we have to wait for something bad to come down from the enemy, before we do something good for ourselves?

This kind of thought promotes apathy, coming from a people that can't afford to be apathetic.

The worst part about being a re-activist, is that it takes the sting away from black protest. It makes us look like we talk a good game, but can't hold it down in the long run. It happens all the time. Some horrible act of discrimination will happen and we'll react. We'll get mad and we'll protest and we'll yell. We'll get their attention and they may sit at the table and talk. All the while, they know that as soon as they promise us a few scraps, we'll shut up and sit.

When you want a dog to shut up and sit, you give it a treat.

Over time, they've become so use to our screamin' that they don't even pay us any mind. It's what happens when you know you can shut somebody up whenever you want. Passivity has become something we're known for.

The black voice has lost a lot of its bite. It's not that the oppressor doesn't know what can happen if black people decided to unite. The fact is, the oppressor isn't afraid of blacks uniting, because we haven't given him a reason to be.

Not since the days of the Civil Rights Movement (with the exception of the Million Man March) has this nations bigots, coward and racists seen what can happen when we unify.

This is not to say that we aren't doing anything for ourselves. No doubt, there are a lot of black men and women out there, taking it to the max, everyday, fighting for the rights of our people. Yet and still, there aren't enough. The front line is dying. Those of us in the corporate world and in political circles can't hold up without the backing of a nation.

That's the bite. That's the power.

When you can create an agenda and have that agenda adhered to, you have power. The black community, united and uplifted, will make sure that agenda is set.

It's time that the oppressed started being activists, in the true sense of the word. You would think that we'd be tired of being ignored and passed in the streets.

Act or react. Shut up or sit.

The choice is yours.

Along the color line
South Africa after apartheid

Editor's note: The following is part two of a three-part series on Cape Town, South Africa

South African society is shaped like a distorted racial pyramid. There is a huge, impoverished black community representing nearly 75 percent of the country's total population. The whites, who comprise 12 percent, perch themselves at the pinnacle of society's pyramid. Just below most whites, but above nearly all black Africans, are the people in between: "the coloureds."

Dr. Manning Marable

Cape Town is located at the Western Cape province, on the extreme southwest corner of the African continent. It is the only major African city south of the Sahara that does not have a black majority. When the Dutch, and later the English, invaded and colonized southern Africa centuries ago, they initially encountered the Khoi and San peoples. The Duch East India Company imported tens of thousands of slaves from India, Madagascar, Indonesia and Malaysia. These multiethnic slave populations brought into South Africa their own distinctive cultures, foods, music and ways of life. European males forcibly violated nonwhite women sexually, producing after several generations a substantial mulatto or mixed racial group. In the late 18th century, black Africans were imported as slaves from east and central Africa, and they were also largely incorporated into the colored group.

Coloureds acquired Afrikaans, the language based primarily on the Dutch spoken by early white colonizers, as their own language. To distinguish themselves from the overwhelmingly black population, most coloureds cultivated cultural and sexual links with Europeans. Dr. Wilmot James, the executive director of the Institute for Democracy in South Africa, who is also coloured, states that early trade unions of coloured artisans "went out of their way to keep blacks out of their ranks."

The coloureds developed "an aesthetic that deeply aspired toward whiteness, European culture and the ways and mores of the master," James observed. "Dark-skinned children were not as loved as the European-looking ones. They were kept out of sight, reduced to the lower ranks of the family hierarchy. Blackness was a curse, a source of sexual shame." Thus the coloured group acquired many of the racist stereotypes and prejudices against black people that whites held.

The coloureds' status was turned upside down with the initiation of apartheid in 1948. Racial segregation had always existed, but apartheid took racial separation to new extremes. Rigid racial categorizations and the geographical isolation of various ethnic groups tore apart thousands of mixed raced families. As James stated, "the monsters from Pretoria, aided by their local counterparts and the police, imposed a fictional racial purity and rigid boundaries between people they wished, in their madness, to be ethnic groups."

In Cape Town, a largely integrated, ethnically diverse urban community called District Six, was marked by the apartheid regime for termination. District Six had been a pleasant neighborhood for coloureds, Malays, Portuguese, Muslims, and many others. The people were forcibly removed from their homes; bulldozers flattened entire city blocks. Today, the former district appears like a vast empty space in front of the city's skyline. Hundreds of thousands of coloureds were transferred to the Mitchell's Plain township, miles from the central city. In Cape Flats, an estimated 80,000 young men are gang members, frequently armed with machine guns and various automatic weapons.

The coloured leadership as a whole finally concluded that apartheid had to go. Thousands of coloureds joined the United Democratic Front, the mass antiapartheid coalition in the 1980s. Many coloured activist were jailed, tortured or banned by the government. Finally, when Nelson Mandela was freed from his prison cell on Robben Island, thousands of coloureds joined their black sisters and brothers to share in the victory.

But barely after apartheid had ended, the coloureds of the Western Cape began complaining that "the blacks" might "take over." They had long played a comfortable buffer role between whites and blacks. Now, they feared that their relative privileges could be taken away.

So on election day in 1994, the coloured electorate voted overwhelmingly for the National Party, the "monsters" that created apartheid and had destroyed many of their own homes in District Six. Over two-thirds of all coloured voters supported the Nationalists, while less than 30 percent endorsed the African National Congress. Nationwide, the National Party received slightly more than 50 percent of its total vote from coloureds, Asians and other nonwhites. So as black Africans go about the difficult task of constructing a genuine democracy, they cannot rely on a coloured population that seeks to maintain their privileges by catering to white racists.

Dr. Manning Marable is a professor of history and director of the Institute for Research in African American Studies at Columbia University.

The beauty of Africa on display

Students perform at Saturday's African Cultural Night.

For Your Information:

There has been much controversy surrounding the issue of the Funkothon. Many people have been wondering, "Is there going to be a Funkothon?" Upon finding out that Funkothon is going to happen, students have been asking questions like: "Why is it in Springfield this year?" and "Why is the BMCP logo on the flyers if they aren't sponsoring it?"

On May 3, a press conference will be held at the Malcolm X Cultural Center to answer all questions regarding the controversy of the Funkothon. Information about student ticket discounts and other relevant topics will also be discussed.

Letters to the Editor

Fist, a symbol of unity

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the poor misguided author of a letter which ran Tuesday, April 21,1998 concerning the Black Affairs logo.

It has come to my attention that you and perhaps others like you, may have misconstrued, misunderstood, misjudged and missed period the point and reasoning behind the Black Affairs page. Hence, mistaken the symbol of the clenched fist as a sign of hatred. No!

The clenched fist logo prominently displayed on the Black Affairs page is the symbol of unity in the Black community. It's the symbol of empowerment for people of the Pan- African Diaspora. It's the representation of unification. Unity, is the one entity people of color have held on to for years, when we were robbed and raped of our ancestral dignities. "Remember that?" My poor misguided author, hypothetically speaking, the Collegian, or any other newspaper or magazine for that matter, which is not specifically geared towards, or designated for the black audience, it is all "White Affairs" when you read the small black print on huge white paper.

That's just how society works. It is all about the white man in power. Therefore as a white male you benefit from everything. It all works in your favor and is specifically geared towards you, unless otherwise. Therefore you fail to realize there are people out there who do not benefit from anything due to color. Hence the clenched fist which may appear assertive, this threatens you. It's perfectly understandable that you do not want to share the lime light with another. This is what you have been taught and it is hard to let go or learn to let go and understand. It's time to be untaught and smell the "unity" of the clenched fist.

Please realize that the Black Affairs page serves as an outlet, a venue, a stage, for people of color to express, and voice opinions, thoughts and ideas in a public forum. In a society that oppresses those who are not of the Caucasian race, a page like this is necessary. It is to let you and others like you know, people of color have something important to say other than "yes sir and thank you ma'am."

In accordance with the purpose and reasoning behind the page, there is a logo which compliments the page. It is in no way meant to provoke hatred, supremacy or aggression. I hope the time I have taken to simplify and explain the reasoning behind the page and logo was appreciated. I hope that you understand the logo is a compliment to a continuous and needed forum. I hope you understand I am not attacking you but merely trying to educate and simplify a confusing misunderstood notion on your part. I hope you realize no one is raising a fist in your face, it's our symbol and there is nothing juvenile about the graphic design.

One last question. Why did you refer to an Asian fist being represented as the color yellow?

Addressing ignorance

Letter to the editor:

On Tuesday, April 21,1998, while sitting in the dinning commons, I picked up a copy of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. While reading the Editorial/Opinion section, I came across a Letter to the Editor entitled "Black Affairs logo should go." Curious as to what the author's grievances were, I proceeded to read the letter. Upon the completion of the second paragraph I was shocked, by the third I was upset, and by the letter's conclusion, I found a pen and began writing my reply.

The author was correct in his assertion that the Black Affairs page's mission is to extend the philosophy of the propagation of diversity and multi-cultural education, but its primary mission is to educate and elevate the black people of the University. He fails to realize that as a diverse group, we need to find a way to be connected and unified as a people. The Black Affairs page is not a "forum for individual vituperation and demagoguery," but rather a forum for honest evaluation and introspection. To state otherwise just demonstrates the author's ignorance. For over four hundred years blacks have been "raped" of their identity. The Black Affairs page is trying to mend those wound, that for so long, have been left unattended.

When certain individuals for some benighted reason, that society, the law, or in this case the Collegian, is being unfair or insensitive to the needs of the non-black students, I wish they would think about how many years we as a people had to sit in the back of the bus; how we had to drink out of dirty water fountains marked colored; how we had to eat at separate facilities and go to separate schools. Think about how many tears we have shed while getting chased with dogs, beaten with bats, and fired upon with water hoses. Think about how we were wiped, hung, and castrated; all in the struggle for freedom, justice, dignity and human rights.

Tell me why we would not want to be in touch with our own? The Black Affairs page is not the only minority group in the history of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian to use a relevant and significant symbol of their struggle to head their page. "The clinched fist logo" is not only appropriate, but is necessary and sufficient for the empowerment, motivation, and unifying principle behind the page. To declare that this symbolic emblem of the "Black" experience is "juvenile" shows that there are certain people who have issues with which they need to deal with.

ARTS & LIVING

An engaging transformation

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Sonic Youth eschewed playing their older, more familiar material Friday night at John M. Greene Hall.

By Marty Kaane
Collegian Staff

SONIC YOUTH / TOM VERLAINE & JIMMY RIPP
John M. Greene Hall
April 24

NORTHAMPTON — When members of Sonic Youth recently said they wouldn't be playing their earlier work live anymore, few, including this writer, took those comments as literally as the band apparently did.

Friday night's show at John M. Greene Hall saw the estimable art–rock outfit play 11 numbers in their 75–minute set. Nine of the songs were drawn from the not–yet–released A Thousand Leaves album and the remaining two — including the opening "Anagrama" — were culled from a pair of experimental EP's released on their own homegrown label, SYR, last year.

While such an approach usually spells death for a band in such a large venue, Sonic Youth are the rare act whose fans have given them carte blanche to do as they please.

Frankly, much, if not all, of their performance was unrecognizable to the crowd, but it still connected with them. Their audience is more than willing to let Sonic Youth get behind the musical wheel and take them for a ride into the hinterlands of rock 'n roll, however abstract and avant garde the inclination.

While it may seem easy to dismiss such a performance as self–indulgent and arrogant, such a judgement would be criminal. Sonic Youth have never had any "hits" per se. They have always had an unerring sense of progression, so why criticize them for not pandering to their audience? It's simply not fair.

The band rarely let loose Friday, choosing instead to slowly unpeel the textured layers of guitar on the new album. Considering the absence of bass on all but one song, it was an appropriate undertaking. The three–guitar attack enabled Lee Ranaldo, Kim Gordon and the ersatz Thurston Moore to blast fresh lead patterns by extrapolating the songs, some several times their length on record. Indicative of this was "Sunday," which featured a more angular riffing style through a wildly improvisational meditation mid–song.

"Hits of Sunshine," the strongest song off A Thousand Leaves and perhaps Sonic Youth's finest moment lyrically, provided the set's high point. Moore's wonderfully detached vocals echoed the cogitative nature of the song (a moving tribute to Allen Ginsberg) while Ranaldo gently massaged his guitar to create a sound that mirrored the reflective mood perfectly.

Long removed from his days as the front–man of the seminal proto–punk group Television, Tom Verlaine, along with Jimmy Ripp created a surprisingly effective mixture of free–form sonic excursions and straighforward countrified rock.

May promises to be hot for soaps

Hi soap fans! I hope everyone had a fab weekend (a little touch of sun would have helped). There's exciting news on the "General Hospital" front this week. Word is, Genie Francis (Laura) is returning to the show for (at least) a three month stint, starting sometime in mid May. Our prayers have been answered my friends. Expect the...ahem, something, to hit the fan when she returns, especially now that Lucky has found out the truth about his parents' not so rosy courtship. You can pretty much kiss Cathy and Count Vlad goodbye too. Rob Guza's been throwing around the idea of putting a wedge between the infamous Luke and Laura. Three guesses as to who that wedge would be. Call me crazy but the idea of Laura and Stefan sizzling up the screen sounds altogether yummy. Let's just hope Genie can finish the stint without getting pregnant again.

In some other "GH" news, as I'm sure most of you have already heard, Maurice Benard (Sonny) is indeed making his way back to the show. That's the good news. The bad is that he'll only be in town for a handful of episodes, fifteen to be exact. "GH"'s Latin flame is back in action and word has it, he's got a nasty streak. Prepare to swoon ladies (ah, those eyes alone...).

What brings him to Port Charles, you ask? Well, without giving too much of the plot away and ruining the surprise, Brenda and Jason hop on an ELQ jet and, well...you know how reliable these planes are in the world of soaps. Sonny catches wind of the crash and the ensuing search and decides to help his once blushing bride to be (yes, the two of them will be sharing some scenes together). For those of you die–hard Sonny and Brenda fanatics who are hoping for reconciliation, don't hold your breath. Brenda would be a fool to take that boy back, especially now that she's got a sure thing with Jax. Either way, May promises to be hot. Forget primetime, daytime's where the real action's at.

It's about that time my friends. May sweeps are almost upon us and does daytime have some treats for you. Here's a taste of what to expect:

"Young and the Restless" — Diane seeks revenge; Victoria struggles with her feelings for another man.

"Another World" — Marley hits town and turns Vicky, Jake and Donna's life upside down; Amanda and Cameron (the rebel without a clue) heat up; Lila finds herself in the thick of everyone else's business while bonding with Cass.

"All My Children" — Brooke continues to battle her legal woes with Dimitri's help. Could romance be far behind? Jack and Mike square off for Erica's hand. Poor Jack, he should just bow out now while he still has an ounce of pride.

"Days of Our Lives" — Saml falls for Franco; Tragedy shakes up the Mike-Carrie-Austin triangle; John and Marlena hit yet another stumbling block (hoo-hum).

"GH" — Laura crashes Stefan and Cathy's engagement party; Luke and Alexis form an alliance; Sonny makes his way back to Port Charles.

"Guiding Light" — Beth turns to Ben for help (Carl's murder); Reva and Reva 2 lock horns.

"Port Charles" — One of "PC"'s most beloved residents falls victim to "General Homicide"' Lucy rummages through Eve's past; There's trouble ahead for Joe and Karen.

"Sunset Beach" — Derek's reign of terror continues; Olivia returns to "SB;" Ricardo fights his feelings for Gabi.

"One Life to Live" — The mystery surrounding Georgie's death intensifies. Nora starts to doubt Bo's innocence.

Watching soaps has always been a social event for moi. It's so much more fun when you have a group of people screaming at the TV and such. In fact, my friends and I have a tradition that I thought I'd pass along. It's a drinking game that adds a little spice to the occasion (for those boring Sunday nights). I'm not one for getting sloshed and making an ass out of myself so I usually stick with one or two beers. I'd advise the same for you. Don't make me regret mentioning it. Here's how to play:

1) Tape one of your fave soaps.

2) Invite a few of your soap pals, sit in front of the TV and crack open a Bud (or poison of your pleasure).

3) Every time one of the things below occurs, you take a sip. It's that simple.

"GH": Take a sip every time...

- Robin starts to preach about morality (take another sip just to get through the scene).
- Carly gets in someone's face.
- Keesha wears one of those god-awful suits (the one's that blind you).
- Anytime Sarah's in a scene.
- Luke makes a joke at the Cassadines' expense.
- Bobbie stares into space.
- Stefan and Jason frown.
- Alan takes a pill.

"Days":

- The characters have a one on one conversation with themselves.
- Marlena cries, takes the high moral ground, waivers between John and Roman or just makes you want to vomit in general.
- Laura is institutionalized.
- Celeste changes her hair color.
- Carrie and Mike exchange lingering looks.
- Sami blackmails someone in town.
- Stefano makes a visit to one of his secret rooms.
- Anytime Franco's in a scene and every time you can't make out a word of what he's saying.

"Y&R":

- Diane cries on Jack's shoulders.
- Nick and Sharon argue.
- Anytime Tricia's in a scene.
- Ashley and Victoria exchange catty looks.
- Ryan professes his love for Tricia (ugh).

UM gains key win in visit to B.C.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

CHESTNUT HILL — Like many sports, lacrosse is a game of luck. A few timely bounces and a few advantageous calls can sometime mean the difference between a win or a loss.

At Boston College on Friday night, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team saw just how important a role luck plays in deciding the outcome of a competition.

At the beginning of the game, the good fortune was favoring the Eagles. Slightly over three minutes into the matchup, B.C. senior captain Danielle Wood fired an apparently high shot from a solid 20 feet away from Minutewomen goalie Jen Nardi. Taking a chance ricochet, the ball deflected straight downward upon hitting the top post and fell behind Nardi for a score.

Roughly two minutes later, after Wood added her second out of five goals and UMass sophomore Colleen Wales retaliated in with a score of her own, another stroke of bad fortune hit Massachusetts.

"Noelle Gorski left the game early on with a strained left hamstring," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "That was interesting because we haven't had a big injury all season. We had to really make some adjustments."

Eagle Maggie Berkery then capitalized on some questionable physical play that went unnoticed by the officials to push the B.C. lead up to 3–1 with just under 20 minutes to go in the half.

UMass did not strike again on offense until the 14:52 mark, after Boston College sophomore Carrie Everett's goal while falling in front of the cage. It seemed as though all of the Eagle shots were magically finding their mark while the Massachusetts attempts avoided the back of the net like the plague. In fact, with 12:43 to go in the half, the Minutewomen were staring down a 5–2 deficit.

"I think that the offense was a little freaky in the beginning," McClellan said. "Once we sat down and just executed, obviously, we were more successful."

With some key strategy changes, the ball started bouncing back in UMass' favor.

"We tried to change our matchups going in to mark their best kid," McClellan said. "We put Anderson down low defensively, and what we really missed was Anderson in the midfield. That really hurt us offensively. We had a hard time matching up against them, and maybe we worried too much about that and made too many drastic changes.

"When we were down 5–2, we switched it back and put Lynne Young on their big kid. I don't know if that necessarily helped take their real big scorer out of the game, but it allowed us to play more of our game."

Massachusetts outscored BC 10–5 the rest of the way out for a close 12–10 victory. That included some luck of their own. With 15:57 to go in the game, sophomore Stephanie Pavlick rocketed a shot that was, again, apparently high. The ball took a hard, straight bounce from the top post into the possession of a conveniently positioned Rebecca Minaker, who redirected the shot back into the cage to push the score up to 8–6.

Laura Korutz continued her dominance over BC by pouring in her 100th career point on four goals and an assist, and Jen Herker scored two key, game deciding goals in the final five minutes to secure a win. Nardi in the goal played calmly in the face of late game pressure to keep the slim lead.

"I just have faith in my defense, and I know that they're going to do it," Nardi said. "They're going to give me a fighting chance to stop the ball. You've just got to come out and play for every game."

Sophomore midfielder Noelle Gorski and the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team went 2–0 on the weekend, facing off with Boston College and New Hampshire.

on the offensive end," Cannella said. "We have to be able to beat people off the dodge. We were beaten on strength wise."

The momentum seemed to swing somewhat in the fourth period after DelPercio's goal. P.G. Massey with drove the left side with 12:09 remaining in the period and attempted a pass which instead found its way past Gebhardt. Eighteen seconds later, Jeff Seals received a pass from Massey and riffled it passed Gebhardt to cut the lead to seven.

It was too little too late.

"This one was not a good one. It is something I've struggled with all year," Kasselakis said. "Although it was Syracuse, you still have to make those saves. I've made them before and I didn't make them today."

With a home game against Brown remaining for next weekend, coach Cannella called the contest "a playoff game" as the Minutemen seemingly need a victory to find their way into the postseason.

"We need to prepare for Brown this week," Canneila said. "This week we need absolute concentration and absolute intensity. We need more of a total team effort."

that way, sitting out a month helped me a lot. I'm concentrating better, and I'm more confident and relaxed.

"This game really reminded me of last year's NCAA Regional win [a eighth inning 3–2 win over Colorado State to send the team to the WCWS], and now, I feel pretty good about moving on to the A–10 Tournament."

Buckley's two–out triple to score junior Mandy Galas in the first inning of the opener was enough for junior pitcher Danielle Henderson (21–6, 0.65 ERA and 308 strikeouts), holding Temple to one hit and no runs scored. Henderson's 16–strikeout performance is now 27 strikeouts shy of the UMass single season and A–10 conference record, and with her 4–0 win over the Hawks she also became the first pitcher in UMass history to record three 20–win seasons.

Gutridge's RBI to score Osier and Buckley's solo homerun in the fourth inning appeared to be a good enough margin for Wagner (4–1, 0.89 ERA) to record her fifth win on the season. The Owls, however, batted around the lineup in the fifth inning and both Wagner and Henderson could not contain a six–run barrage from the Temple bats.

That would only setup Buckley's heroics in the bottom of the fifth, with Gutridge setting the table with her two–RBI single to score Galas and junior Octavia Brown. Henderson went on to retire the side in order in the sixth inning, but the Owls loaded the bases in the seventh before she struck out Christi Ragan to end the game.

"I told the team before the game that Temple is a tough team and they really gave us a run today," Sortino said. "Their record is not true to how good they really are."

Minutewomen Notes: With her two runs scored on the day, Galas (.381 batting average, .529 slugging percentage, 19 RBI) has now broken the UMass single season runs scored record with 51...Gutridge (.423 batting average, 41 RBI) went 2–for–7 on the afternoon to extend her hitting streak to 16 games...UMass will play at noon this Friday in the A–10 Championship and await the result of the postponed doubleheader between Rhode Island and St. Joe's being held today to finalize their upcoming opponent.

UM baseball clinches East title

By Michael Kobykanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team can now book its hotel rooms for the Atlantic 10 baseball tournament in Boyertown, Penn., which is scheduled for May 8–10 at Bear Stadium.

That is because the Minutemen won the A–10 Eastern Division crown by taking a doubleheader from the University of Rhode Island on Saturday afternoon in Kingston, RI. UMass won both games of the twin–bill with identical 2–1 scores.

Junior pitcher Bill Cooke improved to 7–1 on the season by hurling his sixth consecutive complete game in the first game on Saturday. The southpaw gave up only one unearned run on five hits and fanned six in the winning effort.

The Minutemen (24–9, 13–1 Atlantic 10) trailed 1–0 in the second before Matt Wolcott came through with an important single to left field which drove home Doug Clark and Pete Gautreau, with Gautreau representing the eventual game winning run.

In the second game it was fellow classmate Ryan Cameron who earned the victory. Cameron allowed just one run on three hits and struck out five.

Clark, who went 3–for–5 on the afternoon, scored both runs for UMass in game two. Brian Samela plated him with the first run on a sacrifice fly, while Gautreau drove in the UMass center fielder with an RBI single in the fourth.

Senior second baseman Muchie Dagliere had a hit in game one, but was shut down in game two, ending his hitting streak at 31 games.

UMass also played the Rams in the final game of the series yesterday. They will next hit the diamond tomorrow when they travel to Vermont to face the Catamounts.

Catch tomorrow's Collegian for a full wrap–up of all of the weekend contests as well as a preview of the Vermont contest.

Lacrosse crushed by Orangemen

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — A win over Notre Dame in South Bend, Ind. put a stop to the three game skid and put the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team back on track in hope of a second consecutive NCAA appearance.

Yesterday at the Carrier Dome, the confidence and momentum of the Minutemen was sent back to square one, as they fall to 7–4 on the season.

The college lacrosse juggernaut known as the Syracuse Orangemen, who at 8–2 have had an off year, beat UMass in every aspect of the game, defeating the Minutemen 12–3 in what coach Greg Cannella said was, "a game we were never in at any point."

While Syracuse's potent offensive attack is praised coast to coast, it was their defense which has been a question mark all season. Ironically, it was their defense that ensured the Orangemen of their victory.

"Everybody always talks about their offense but today their defense really played us tough," Cannella said. "We didn't shoot particularly well, but when you play a team like Syracuse, you have to connect on your own opportunities and we didn't do that."

UMass' first quarter woes bled into the second half as the Minutemen defense struggled to decipher the Syracuse offensive attack.

The net behind Orangemen goalie Jason Gebhardt stood motionless for nearly three periods as Syracuse ran off 10 goals to start the game. That was until senior midfielder Mike DelPercio put a shot past Gebhardt with five and a half minutes remaining in the third frame.

Massachusetts	3
Syracuse	12

The first half could have been labeled as the brothers' Powell show as Ryan and Casey, two of collegiate lacrosse's most feared attackmen, combined for eight points (two goals, two assists each).

The two teamed up to open the scoring when Casey fed Ryan on the left side. Ryan, double-teamed and at a tough angle, went up and under, bouncing it past goalie John Kasselakis for his 24th goal of the season. Casey got into the scoring card with 10 minutes gone in the first quarter, posting two goals in a 30 second span to close out the period.

"We got our butts kicked in the first half," defenseman Harold Drumm said. "We didn't give the effort that we needed to give."

UMass didn't help its cause in the second quarter as Matt Cutia and Ryan Powell booked up three times to extend the Syracuse lead to 6–0. Included was in the spree was a goal by Powell which came on an alley–oop–like pass from Cutia.

UMass' offense continued to struggle as time went on in the first half. The Minutemen's three goals in the game represents the lowest total since losing to Brown 7–2 in 1993.

"We lacked leadership

Lax on the bubble; Brown a must-win

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — There was not much talk as the members of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team filed out of their locker room after yesterday's game against Syracuse at the Carrier Dome. The Orangemen's 12–3 winning margin, still displayed on the scoreboard, was the reason.

"I was disappointed," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "They were disappointed too. They don't like to lose and I hate to lose, particularly the way we did today.

"It's quite obvious we didn't play well today," he continued. "We played good defense and John played well in the cage, but we lacked leadership on offense."

Not that all was negative for the Minutemen. Indeed, the defensive unit performed well considering the daunting nature of its task: stopping a talented attack that is led by perhaps the best collegiate player in the nation, Casey Powell.

"Harold [Drumm] played tough against Casey Powell," Canella said. "He's the kind of guy who, when the smoke settles, will look back and say Harold played great."

The matchup impressed UMass defensive midfielder P.G. Massey, who not only contributed with his defense, but with a goal and an assist as well.

"Casey's one of the best players to ever play the sport," he said. "Harold is the best defenseman I've ever seen and the matchup between the two was unbelievable."

Powell and his brother, Ryan, did a significant portion of the damage for Syracuse. Ryan had three goals and two assists, while Casey finished with two scores and as many seeds.

"[Casey] is a great player. I did the best I can," Drumm said. "I'm happy with how I played him one–on–one."

But according to Drumm, the reason for the UMass loss was much more basic than the Powells' progress.

"We got our butts kicked in the first half. People weren't making the effort we needed to give."

The loss drops the Minutemen to 7–4 on the year with one game — a home contest against Brown Saturday at 2 p.m. at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium — remaining.

"It's like a playoff game," Cannella said of the matchup with the Bears.

UMass has been in this situation as recently as last year when a 9–4 win over Brown no doubt secured a spot in the postseason. The Minutemen therefore know that what happens this week in practice — and consequently against the Bears on Saturday — could determine whether or not they will make their first back to back NCAA appearances since UMass went to eight tournaments in a row from 1986 to 1993.

"We're a bubble team," Cannella said. "And whether or not we get in depends on what happens this week.

"I'm worried about this team and our performance in practice. Our attitude in practice is what will change my feelings. We need more of a team effort."

UMass goaltender John Kasselakis said the objective for the next week is simple.

"In lacrosse it's always tough because you have 13 games and every one is so important," he said. "We just have to come out and beat Brown."

Massey is hoping he and his fellow seniors can lend an added incentive to Saturday's game.

"I want [the team] to know that this could be my last lacrosse game," he said. "We get frustrated when we're not winning, and we make mistakes. We have to make it fun again and concentrate on the Brown game."

Drumm offered a similar perspective a week earlier.

"If I play like I have two games left in my career and everybody plays that way, then I won't have only two games left in my career," he said after last week's 8–7 win over Notre Dame.

Sortino records 600th career win

Minutewomen clinch 11th A–10 title with weekend sweep

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The old saying goes something like "when it rains, it pours" — and in the case of yesterday's doubleheader between the Temple and the Massachusetts softball teams, it could not have been more true to the metaphor.

In a mind–boggling myriad of occurrences at Totman Field this weekend, the exciting two–game sweep of the Owls (16– 28, 6–10 Atlantic 10) by the Minutewomen (35–12, 15–1 A– 10) heralded the last home games of the UMass senior class and the 599th and the 600th career wins for coach Elaine Sortino.

With the doubleheader most likely being the end for seniors Kelly Buckley, Kim Gutridge, Tracy Osier and Liz Wagner at Totman Field — unless UMass makes the NCAA Tournament, and consequently receives the home field advantage in the East Regional — a not–that–unlikely heroine stood out amongst the foursome.

Buckley capped off a 5–for–7 day, which included four RBI, a triple and her first home run of the season, with the game–winning RBI in both the 2–0 win in the opener, and the 8–6 win in the nightcap.

The combination of the 4–0, 9–1 sweep of St. Joseph's on Saturday that clinched the eighth straight A–10 regular season title for the Minutewomen (the 11th title in 13 years), and the No. 1 seed in the upcoming A–10 Championships held this weekend in Kingston, R.I., led to celebration by all — even amidst a rainy conclusion to the nightcap.

You cannot blame any of the UMass faithful for being emotional after a weekend deftly disguised by some higher power as an intense adrenaline rush — nevermind Sortino herself. With her 600th career win, Sortino (600–279–3) now becomes the only Northeast Region coach to eclipse that mark, and is the 16th active coach to reach that milestone.

"I'll never forget this [win]...I never forget any of them," Sortino said. "The seniors will never forget this day. I'm very happy for the kids, and they showed tremendous character to come back and pull that [nightcap] win out.

Massachusetts	2

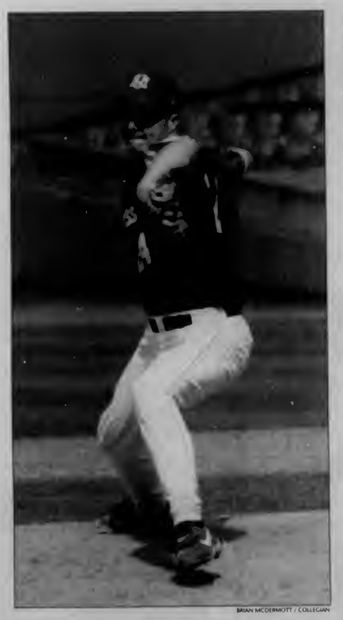
"It was tough to pitch out there because of the rain, and you never knew where the ball was going to go. We feel fortunate to get these wins, but we did make our own breaks to get these wins as well."



Buckley herself has had a remarkable comeback from a left thumb injury that forced her to concede the catching spot to sophomore Nikki Faessler on March 14, and instead become the designated player. After almost a month out due to the setback, the Horseheads, N.Y. native has been on fire at the plate, boosting her average from .238 to .357 in the last 16 games, while plating 16 RBI.

Massachusetts	8
Temple	8

In the end, Buckley could not have dreamed a more proper resolution to their home slate — and her Senior Day. Her two–RBI single in the fifth inning of the nightcap capped off a six–run comeback to put the Minutewomen up for good, with the looming threat of the game being called because of the late afternoon downpour.

"This day was perfect for us, and perfect for Elaine," Buckley said. "I could not think of a better way to end Senior Day. I've been more focused at the plate lately, and in

Israel will retaliate if Palestine declares state

JERUSALEM (AP) — Saying Israel could not accept a "new Iraq or Iran" on its doorstep, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu warned yesterday that Israel would retaliate if Palestinians declare a state before reaching a peace agreement.

The Israeli leader, in one of his toughest statements yet on Palestinian statehood, refused to say what steps might be taken. The most likely option would be the annexation of disputed West Bank land by Israel.

"We cannot accept and mustn't accept the formation of a new Iraq or Iran next to our doorstep," Netanyahu told the Foreign Press Association. "If the Palestinians react with unilateral actions, so will we."

The statement came in reaction to a warning from Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who told reporters in the autonomous Gaza Strip over the weekend that he would press ahead with a declaration of statehood if there was no peace settlement by May 4, 1999, the deadline set in the Oslo accords.

"It's our right, and we're going to declare it," Arafat said. He has made similar assertions before.

NATION

Wheelchair accessible arenas to be designed

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation's largest architectural firm agreed to design new stadiums and arenas so spectators in wheelchairs still have a full view when other fans stand up, the Justice Department announced yesterday.

The agreement settles a lawsuit filed by the Justice Department in October 1996 charging that the Ellerbe Becket firm had violated the Americans with Disabilities Act with its designs of arenas in Boston; Buffalo, N.Y.; Cleveland; Philadelphia; Portland, Ore.; and Washington, D.C.

The agreement was approved by the U.S. District Court in Minneapolis on Friday.

The disabilities law requires that stadiums and arenas built after Jan. 26, 1993, provide seating for wheelchair users that allows lines of sight to the floor or field that are comparable to those that other spectators have. When fans stand during exciting parts of a game, wheelchair users often are blocked from seeing the event.

Police praised for their work at event; nine arrests made

It was a beautiful day Saturday for the Extravaganja.

AMHERST — Police arrested nine individuals for possession of a class D substance during the 7th Annual Extravaganja, a festival promoting the legalization of marijuana, which was held on Amherst Town Common this past Saturday.

Brian P. LaPointe, 19, of Enfield Conn.; Jeremy M. Texeira, 18, of Cornwall, Conn.; Matthew B. Beliz, 23, and Brian Millinger, 23, both of Amherst; Ruben Baker DeKaser, 18, of Bolton; Stephen B. Colby, 23, of Hanson; John E. Lewandowski, 20, of Holyoke; Ryan K. Bussinger, 21, of West Springfield and a 15–year–old female of Haydenville were all arrested between the hours of 11 a.m. and 5 p.m. for possession of marijuana.

According to the University of Massachusetts Cannibus Reform Coalition (CRC) spokesperson Terry Franklin, this is the first year arrests have been made during the Extravaganja.

"I don't think that this little plant is so dangerous, that they have to turn the town into an armed camp over it," Franklin said.

But Police Chief Donald Mala maintained the role of the police and enforced the rules against marijuana possession.

"They have the right to assemble, but they don't have the right to break the law," Mala said.

No–shows cancel debate

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Two of three debates scheduled last night between candidates running for University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) president and trustee were cancelled.

One debate was cancelled due to lack of candidate participation. Two candidates out of the seven candidates running came to the debate.

"The debate, due to a lack of candidate participation, is officially cancelled as a SCERA sponsored debate," Jason Vecchio, student coordinator of SCERA said.

Salwa Shamapande, candidate for SGA president, and Eleanor Court, candidate for student trustee, did attend the SCERA sponsored debate.

After the official cancellation Shamapande and Court answered the questions that had been prepared by SCERA touching on issues of the off–campus alcohol policy, University Center 2000 project, and the fee freeze.

Erik Hansen, candidate for student trustee, did not attend the debate.

"I had a couple papers to do and for me school comes first before the campaign," Hansen said.

Amy Pellegrino, candidate for president, did not attend the debate due to a libelous flyer concerning Pellegrino's campaign posted on campus.

UMass police said they are investigating two reports about the poster but refused comment at this time because it is an ongoing investigation.

Jennifer Casasanto, candidate for president, could not be reached for comment.

Jeffrey Howe, candidate for student trustee, could not be reached for comment.

Daniel Parker, candidate for president could not be reached for comment.

The debate sponsored by the silent majority was postponed until today. The replacement debate will be aired on WMUA tonight from 6:30–9 p.m.

An Asian Latino African Native American [ALANA] roundtable discussion was the only scheduled debate held last night between candidates running in the SGA elections.

The ALANA roundtable was a discussion between candidates running for SGA president and ALANA Registered Student Organizations (RSO).

Issues concerning ALANA students were discussed.

"In other debates the questions we wanted answers to weren't being asked," Ricardo Rodriguez, mediator of the debate, said in an earlier interview.

The meeting was closed to the public.

However, Rodriguez said in an earlier interview, that a mediator asked each candidate three questions that concerned ALANA students. The RSOs in attendance were then allowed to ask the candidates questions.

Wolf to talk on feminist issues

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Naomi Wolf, noted author, feminist, and social critic will give a lecture tonight concerning women, politics, and empowerment at 8 p.m. in the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center.

Wolf has written three books; The Beauty Myth, Fire with Fire and Promiscuities: The Secret Struggle for Womanhood, the first of which has been credited with starting a third wave of feminism.

"The Beauty Myth has been called the most important feminist book in twenty years and serves as a manifesto for the third wave of feminism," stated a press release from the Distinguished Visitors Program (DVP) who is sponsoring the program.

The lecture title "Fire with Fire" is taken from her latest book entitled "Fire with Fire: The new female power and how it will change the 21st Century."

Wolf has also written numerous articles and essays.

"Her essays have appeared in various publications including: The New Republic, Wall Street Journal, Glamour, Ms., Esquire, The Washington Post, and The New York Times," the press release stated.

In 1994 Wolf was named one of Time magazine's fifty most promising leaders under age forty and was selected by Glamour magazine as one of Glamour's Women of the Year.

Wolf was educated at Yale University and at New College, Oxford University where she was a Rhodes Scholar. She currently resides in Washington D.C. and speaks widely on college campuses.

Tonight's lecture will be free for the UMass community, $2 with a five–college ID, and $5 for the general public.

Complex will replace bombed fed. building

By Rochelle Hines
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — Designs for a $30 million, three–building complex to replace the bombed federal building were unveiled yesterday.

The new complex would be about two blocks from where the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building stood and house some of the federal agencies that were displaced by the bombing — but not all. "Some agencies are not coming back," said Richard Williams, a bombing survivor and building manager for the federal General Services Administration. "Social Security made the decision that they could serve their constituencies better where they are now." The design for the 185,000–square–foot complex, surrounded by trees and connected by a broad sidewalk, incorporates security standards recommended by the government after the blast, but in "a park–like atmosphere," Williams said.

"It's an adventure," said Carol Ross Barney, president of the Chicago–based Ross Barney and Jankowski, the lead architects on the project. "It's giving us the opportunity to make it very safe, but not a fortress."

Ms. Barney said the government requires that the design include a barrier that could stop a 2–ton vehicle traveling 30 mph. The buildings are also pushed back 100 feet from the street and landscaped slopes are placed in front to limit vehicle access, she said.

A truck parked outside the Murrah building exploded April 19, 1995, killing 168 people. A memorial for the victims is planned for the site where the building stood.

Prospective tenants of the new complex will have another opportunity to offer opinions on the planned complex before it is approved by Congress, which has appropriated funding for construction.

Government officials hope to open the complex in 2001.

Bishop slain in defense of human rights violations

By Alfons Anzueto
Associated Press

GUATEMALA CITY — On Friday, Bishop Juan Gerardi Conedera presented a scathing report on human rights violations during Guatemala's 36–year civil war. Late Sunday, the 75–year–old prelate was beaten to death with a concrete block.

It was the first killing of a high–ranking church member in Central America since peace accords ended civil wars that wracked the region throughout the 1980s.

Neither Roman Catholic church officials nor prosecutors gave a motive yesterday for the crime, in which someone smashed Gerardi's head and left the body in a pool of blood in the garage of his residence at San Sebastian church. Nothing was stolen from the house.

If the killing was retaliation for the report, it shows that animosity from the civil war did not end with Guatemala's 1996 peace agreement. If it was a random attack, it is yet another manifestation of the crime wave caused by the war's legacy of plentiful weapons, poverty and a culture of violence.

Rev. Mario Orantes, a parish priest at San Sebastian, said he discovered Gerardi's body lying next to a bloodied concrete block about midnight. The face was so smashed in that he identified the bishop by his ring.

Gerardi, head of the Guatemala City archdiocese's human rights office, had issued a report Friday that blamed the army and its paramilitaries for nearly 80 percent of the killings during the war.

Jose Miguel Vivanco, executive director of the Americas branch of Human Rights Watch, called the killing politically motivated. "I can't believe this was just an isolated common crime," he said from Washington in a telephone interview.

"Nobody really expected this from today's Guatemala," Vivanco said. "Look at the success of the peace process, the fact that politically motivated crimes have decreased dramatically — almost to zero.

"This is really a wakeup call," he said. "I think the agents linked to the secrurity apparatus are still very much active." The head author of the report, Edgar Gutierrez, said the timing was suspicious, saying "we can't ignore" the fact that the report had just been released.

The report, drawn up by Roman Catholic Church human rights agencies, stemmed from the peace accords. The agreements called for the conflict to be investigated to determine the truth for historical purposes.

Jean Arnault, director of the U.N. mission for Guatemala, called the killing "a violent contrast, given that Gerardi was a man who played a role in the peace process."

Gerardi was the first bishop slain in Guatemala.

Attorney General Hugo Perez Aguilera called the crime "a vile murder," and said a police artist had drawn up a sketch of the male suspect from witnesses' descriptions.

Guatemalan Archbishop Prospero Penados del Barrio said Gerardi's body would be laid out at the Guatemala City cathedral for three days before burial later this week.

In Vatican City, the church's daily newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, called the bishop "one of the most strenuous defenders of human rights during the bloody civil war." It said Pope John Paul II had met several times with Gerardi during the pope's 1996 visit to Guatemala.

U.N. Secretary–General Kofi Annan condemned the slaying "in the strongest terms" and expressed hope that "full light will soon be brought on the circumstances and motivations behind this brutal act."

During the 1980's, Gerardi served as bishop of Guatemala's heavily Indian Quiche province, the scene of much of the fighting and many of the human rights abuses he described in Friday's report.

In a country of 8 million people, government officials put the war's death toll at 130,000 to 140,000 people.

Captain Charles Sherpe said that officers were present at last years Extravaganja, but that no arrests were made because there were no flagrant violations.

The arrests were made by plain-clothed policemen, who patrolled the estimated crowd of 1,000 to 1,500 people in two groups of three officers.

According to officer Jose Geronimo, the arrests were made after officers viewed the people in question engaging in the act of smoking marijuana.

Sherpa said the police were fair and up front, and had warned Extravaganja organizers that they would be present at the event.

Geronimo said the police chose to work in plain clothes because they wanted to avoid any confrontations.

"We don't want to go in with batons and helmets," Geronimo said. "We're not about getting into fights."

Franklin admitted that, while the arrests angered Extravaganja organizers, they were pleased with the way they were carried out.

"We want to commend the Amherst police for being professional when they made the arrests," Franklin said. "In similar arrests elsewhere, the police can be brutal."

Franklin also said that the arrests will not hinder Extravaganja sponsors; the CRC, the Amherst Cannibus Education Association from Amherst College and Hampshire HEMP from Hampshire College from planning future events.

"We're not deterred," Franklin said. "The arrests pumped a lot of energy into people, everyone's redoubling their efforts for next year."

Clinton to oppose bilingual ed. cut

By Cassandra Burrell
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Clinton administration officials, including the president himself, will travel to California to speak out against Proposition 227, a ballot measure that would dismantle the state's bilingual education programs.

Replacing a multiplicity of bilingual education programs with a one-year course of instruction taught mostly in English would leave schoolchildren without needed skills, including ones that will help them find jobs in the future, Marshall Smith, the Education Department's acting deputy secretary, said yesterday.

"The best data that we have, the best research that we have suggests that the one-year immersion structure... is a major mistake," Smith said. "The movement under way in California is not based in sound policy or research."

Instead, the administration is calling for an alternative strategy — setting the nationwide goal of limiting most children's participation in bilingual programs to three years. Clinton will speak out on the issue in California, but it was unclear whether he will do it during a trip there this weekend, White House spokesman Barry Toiv said.

In a written statement, Education Secretary Richard Riley said Proposition 227, also called the Unz Amendment, "is not the way to go. In my opinion, adoption of the Unz Amendment will lead to fewer children learning English and many children falling further behind in their studies."

The three-year limitation would be a goal, not a requirement, Riley and Smith said.

"Individual differences and circumstances may cause some children to take longer, but a goal of learning English within three years is reasonable," Riley said.

California Gov. Pete Wilson said Monday he had not decided whether he favors the proposition but "I'm strongly leaning that way." He accused President Clinton of using the issue to play politics.

"I frankly think he has no business. I think the U.S. Department of Education has no business, substituting his judgment for that of the people of California," Wilson said.

White House spokesman Mike McCurry said the California vote could affect bilingual programs nationwide. "There's some reason to believe that federal bilingual education programs are at some risk because of measures pending in Congress that would cut funding for those programs," McCurry said.

Current law calls for, but does not require, non-English-speaking children to go through three to five years of bilingual education, Smith said.

Proposition 227, authored by Silicon Valley millionaire and unsuccessful gubernatorial candidate Ron Unz, would require children with limited ability to speak English to be taught "overwhelmingly" in English for a year before being moved into regular classrooms. Supporters say the current system takes too long and produces children who never become proficient in English. Residents of California, where 55 different languages are officially recognized in the schools, will vote on it June 2. Statewide polls show about 60 percent of voters support it, including about half the Hispanic voters polled.

Across the nation, about 3.2 million students have limited English skills, and 1.3 million are in local and state bilingual programs, the Education Department said. The number of limited-English students has nearly doubled in less than a decade. Of some 5 million California public school students in kindergarten through the 12th grade, about 1.4 million have limited English proficiency. About one-fourth of those are in the Los Angeles Unified School District, the nation's second-largest public school district.

Although Proposition 227 does not appear to be unconstitutional on its face, officials trying to implement it could run afoul of federal civil rights laws, Smith said.

"Case law requires school districts to take steps to ensure that national-origin minority students with limited English proficiency must be able to effectively participate in the regular educational program offerings," Smith said.

Riley and Smith also criticized the ballot measure as one that would impose a "one size fits all" approach on the entire state. The administration's proposal would give local school districts the flexibility to design programs best for their areas and let teachers decide what is best for a particular student, they said. "The Unz Initiative is a direct attack on local control of education," Riley said.

Boston celebrates Israel's 50th

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Thousands gathered on the Boston Common Sunday afternoon for Israel's 50th Anniversary Jubilee. The late afternoon showers drenched organizers hopes of 75,000 people, yet the music, food, culture, and education went on.

The name Jubilee dates back to ancient Israel when the 50th anniversary had special significance. Yet the celebration was very modern; celebrating the diverse culture of the Israeli people and the connections which have been formed between the people of Israel and the people of Boston.

"For all of us to have the opportunity to celebrate publicly in a major city shows Israel's [significance] in the world of nations," Alan Mann, Executive Vice President of the Jewish Community Centers (JCC) of Greater Boston, said.

The JCC was the lead agency to sponsor the event which took over 16 months to plan. Mann praised the more than 3,000 volunteers it took to put on the festival.

The actual 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence is May 14th and like the 50 years of Israeli nationhood, not much happens without controversy.

Over 300 people marched from Copley Square to the outskirts of the common to protest Israel's occupation of land formerly held by Palestinians.

Palestine 50, a coalition of several activist groups chanted "Justice for Palestine now" while displaying signs of Palestinian towns they claimed were obliterated under Israeli rule.

Despite the conflicting groups no arrests were made and both events ended peacefully.

The Jubilee was modeled after Boston's first night where the festival attendee was invited to explore the Common and the several dozen events which were scheduled through out the day.

The biggest names on the main stage were Israeli entertainers Dani Sanderson and Mazi Cohen. There were also Falafel vendors, travel information, book vendors, a multi-media presentation, and a separate stage for college musical and singing groups to perform.

Liz Glicksman, a 1993 UMass graduate who currently works in advertising, said she was excited to be a part of the event and her table, which was a program bringing adults to Israel for the first time.

"It's nice to be a part of the Jewish community," Glicksman said.

Len Laxe, a psychology professor at Brandeis University was representing the volunteer organization Combined Jewish Philantrophy, which works to build cultural bridges between Boston and its paired Israeli city, Haifa.

"There are lots of connections between Boston and the people of Israel," Laxe said.

Laxe discussed the exchange of students, architectural projects, and teachers. He has spent a semester teaching psychology in Haifa.

UMass Hillel arranged for a busload of students to travel to Boston for the day.

Hillel Program Director David Arfa said, "It was a lot of fun, even with the rain."

"It was really great even with the weather, I especially liked the music," said local high school student Ariella Perlmutter.

The campus community will be further celebrating the anniversary this Thursday. Events will be held in front of the Hillel House from 3–8 p.m.

Economist chips away at tobacco antitrust allegations

By Karren Mills
Associated Press

ST. PAUL, Minn. — An economist testifying for tobacco companies refuted charges yesterday that cigarette makers conspired to suppress research into safer cigarettes.

"It would be totally economically implausible" to engage in a conspiracy that would cost the industry business, said David Scheffman, a Vanderbilt University antitrust expert.

"It makes no sense to have a conspiracy the effect of which... would be to dramatically reduce industry sales."

Scheffman was called to refute testimony last month by a Brandeis University professor who said tobacco companies had an agreement to not claim one brand was safer than the other. His testimony came during the 15th week of a trial in which the state of Minnesota and Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Minnesota are seeking $1.77 billion they claim they've spent treating smoking-related illnesses, plus punitive damages.

The plaintiffs claim the tobacco companies used fraud, deceptive practices and collusion to sell their product.

Scheffman, who worked with the Federal Trade Commission on enforcement of federal antitrust laws, said one method the FTC uses to investigate alleged conspiracies is to determine whether the allegations make sense.

In response to bad publicity in the 1950's linking smoking and disease, Scheffman said cigarette companies introduced filtered cigarettes and made health claims about those cigarettes in their advertising.

The industry also got together "to try to deal with the public relations nightmare they were facing" by forming the Tobacco Industry Research Committee to aid and assist research into all phases of tobacco use and health.

Hostage crisis ends peacefully

By David Howland
Associated Press

NEW BEDFORD, Mass. — A hostage crisis that began with a police shootout in a McDonald's restaurant ended yesterday morning when 13 people were freed by a SWAT team, and two escaped their captor at a New York City motel.

A crowd of more than 200 people cheered outside the McDonald's after a SWAT team swarmed the restaurant at midnight.

A masked gunman was found dead in the back of the building from a gunshot he might have suffered in a shootout with police at the outset of the three-hour standoff, Police Chief Arthur Kelly said. A few hours later, two female hostages who were taken during the shootout by a second gunman, escaped from a motel in the Bronx. The women, ages 23 and 20, were bound and gagged but managed to free themselves from a room at the Oasis Motel and call for help, according to New York City police. One of them was a McDonald's employee.

Their captor escaped with a gun, police said.

In New Bedford, officials were relieved that what started as an apparent botched robbery ended without more bloodshed.

"They did a fine job this evening," City Council President Brian Gomes said of police after the first 13 hostages were freed. "Our prayers were with those being held hostage. We just wanted everything to turn out all right."

Kelly said the standoff started when police were called to the restaurant on a commercial strip north of downtown about a report of two suspicious men at about 9 p.m.

When two officers tried to talk to the men, they pulled out guns and fired at them. Police returned fire and ran out with other customers. One of the gunmen escaped though a back door with a female hostage and drove away in a car.

As a crowd gathered behind yellow police tape about 100 yards from the restaurant, SWAT team members surrounded the building. Kelly said police were unable to make contact with the gunman, but spoke to at least one hostage by cell phone. Hostages told police the gunman was lying near the back door, apparently injured. As police stood up the scene, some of the hostages discussed running for the door.

"We decided that they were at the point where they needed to come out, or they were going to be doing it on their own," Kelley said.

At midnight, SWAT team members snuck up to the building, opened a door with a key and found the gunman dead.

Officers, following what Kelly said is standard procedure, took the hostages out and made them lie on the ground and handcuffed them until it was determined they were hostages, and that a gunman was not among them.

Corporate "rights"

We Americans know all about rights, right? I mean, Americans practically wrote the book on rights, what with the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights. And now, ironically, our passion for rights has provided the core of a new form of international totalitarianism — by extending the concept of rights to corporations.

Many of you may already believe that corporations have rights. And for you malcontents out there who don't believe it, laws are being prepared to ensure corporate rights, so fooey on you. The fact is, we are in the middle of a Civil Rights Movement for corporations — and it's worldwide.

Daniel Bodah

Lately, the news is full of stories about this movement. Did you notice the articles about UMass professors using public money to develop their private technology companies? Remember hearing about the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) and how President Clinton wants to expand it so that corporations have their rights to exploit every protected market? Or how about the merger between The Traveler's Group and Citibank, which directly violates a law that they expect to be changed just for them?

Then there's the purpose of Clinton's recent trip to Africa. No, it wasn't so that he could educate himself about the horrible political manipulation and environmental damage Shell Oil has caused in Nigeria — his purpose was to push a new "Sub-Saharan NAFTA" bill, the Crane-Lugar bill now in Congress, which would force African nations to undergo a series of economic "adjustments" in order to maintain their trade status with the United States. These adjustments, of course, would require African nations to spend less money on education and health care — both of which are in critical demand right now.

According to Global Trade Watch, one in five children in Africa die before the age of five, and 50 percent of Africans live below the poverty line. Forty percent of Africans suffer from malnutrition and hunger.

Not only that, but over 44 million African children are not in primary school. In fact, Africa is the only developing region in the world with declining school attendance rates, and this decline is correlated with economic development programs imposed by the International Monetary Fund (IMF).

Not spending money on health care and education should really save countries some money — money that can be spent on tax incentives and publicly-funded largess to benefit transnational corporations. The line of reasoning supposedly goes that international investment in African economies will produce more jobs, increase the amount of money in those economies, and lead to prosperity for all.

In fact, liberalized trade agreements will allow foreign companies to crush their local competitors and then take as much of their profits as possible out of the country, back home to their U.S. or German investors. Meanwhile, the host country benefits only marginally with some low-paying, exploitative jobs, while losing a local, self-sufficient economy.

This is not sustainable development, it's economic rape. Africans lose independence, U.S. workers lose to cheap overseas labor, and transnationals win big.

The Multilateral Agreement on Investments (MAI) — I swear these things get such boring names in the hopes that people will ignore them — is another upcoming trade agreement, one specifically designed as an investment "Bill of Rights." The MAI is really pretty scary. It takes the huge step of explicitly putting corporate rights above the law.

The MAI aims to establish an international court, staffed by investment and business experts, where corporations could sue to have laws repealed on the basis that they unfairly restrict their rights.

For instance, if Massachusetts decides that any company that gets caught dumping poison in the Connecticut River more than five times can't do business in the state anymore, the company could sue the state for violating its rights. Or if Congress passes a law outlawing an additive in gasoline because it's thought to be toxic, the company can sue for taxpayer money to reimburse its "lost opportunity to enjoy an investment."

It should be transparently obvious to anyone with a grip on reality that corporations don't really have rights.

After all, corporations aren't people. They are not born, they have no soul, they do not even physically exist — they're only ideas and social conventions. But to really drive the point home, consider how corporations have been allowed to patent and control both human genes and, more recently, water.

That's right, a U.N. commission recently decided that water is a valued commodity to be sold, not a basic human need. I guess we can really do without the 98 percent or so of ourselves that is water. Now add to this, based on legal precedents reported in the May, 1998 issue of Discover magazine, that companies can take tissue samples from you without your consent and patent your genes.

Get ready to start paying to exist. Your rights have been duly considered, but here in the land of the free we need to make sure everyone has rights. And transnational corporations, since they are bigger than you, get theirs first.

Daniel Bodah is a Collegian columnist.

Crises in Iraq: part one

The genocide in your name

Since the end of the Gulf War in 1991, the people of Iraq have been subjected to a trade blockade and embargo of food and medicine which is unprecedented in human history. These sanctions were devised and imposed by American officials, acting through a compliant by the United Nations, in your name.

The results were as predictable and inevitable as they are appalling. The United Nations documented the needless deaths of at least 567,000 Iraqi children under the age of five by the end of 1995. Best estimates are that by now at least 1.5 million Iraqis have been killed by these vicious, brutal sanctions which do nothing more than systematically deny medicine to the sick and food to the hungry. All for your benefit, the American officials say, all in your name.

Hussein Ibish

Iraqis estimate, without contradiction, that at least 6,000 people a month are dying as a direct result of the lack of food and medicine. UNICEF estimated in 1996 that more than 4,500 Iraqi children under the age of five are dying each month from hunger and disease. In your name.

The people of Iraq, once the well-fed beneficiaries of an outstanding free public health system, one of the best in the Third World, for the last seven years have been denied access to the most basic medical supplies, including aspirin, antibiotics and anesthesia, let alone anything more sophisticated. The World Health Organization found in February, 1997 that "the consequences of this situation are causing a near-breakdown of the health care system, which is reeling under the pressure of being deprived of medicine, other basic supplies and spare parts."

Iraq is also dependent on food imports to feed its people, being able to grow only about 50 percent of what it needs. The embargo has left Iraq with almost no ability to buy food for its people, who have been reduced to a starvation diet. No surprise then that the Iraqi population is being literally decimated. In your name.

The effects of these sanctions are little known and not widely understood in this country. Very few Americans are aware, and far fewer still will admit, that the government of the United States has in this manner presided over the greatest slaughter of humans conducted in the 1990s, far surpassing the genocides in Rwanda and Bosnia in scope.

One key reason for this is the quiet, even silent, method of mass murder that these kind of sanctions employ. So far from the frenzied machetes of Rwanda, so unlike the machine guns and mass graves in Srebrenica, sanctions kill with no cut, bullet, or bomb. They murder millions slowly, quietly, insidiously without screams or bloodshed. In your name.

Such sanctions are the most sophisticated weapon of mass destruction yet devised. They utilize the common enemies of humanity — hunger, disease, bacteria, viruses, pollution — and by denying an entire nation access to the basic protections that civilization has offered to these killers, wipe out millions in utter silence. In that sense they are the biological weapon par excellance. The New England Journal of Medicine put it well in its April 24, 1997 editorial, "It is abundantly clear that the economic sanctions [against Iraq] are, at their core, a war against public health."

This is not an unanticipated consequence or a well-meaning policy tragically gone awry. American officials orchestrated this holocaust deliberately, not in spite of, but rather because of, the human cost. After seven years of unremitting horror, there can be no doubt of this left.

These same officials feel they can get away with claiming great concern for the well-being of the Iraqi people. This is because the sanctions kill so slowly, so quietly, in such an innovative, insidious and "invisible" way, that denial, both rhetorical and psychological, becomes easier than ever. But the killing goes on, in your name.

Of course, when Secretary of State Madeline Albright was put on the spot in May, 1996, and asked if this policy can be worth the deaths of over 500,000 children, she simply said, "We think the price is worth it." She did not dispute the figures or the causality, nor did she indicate how many children she was prepared to see die as a direct result of her policies. Clinton administration officials do not seem to have a limit on the number of Iraqi children to be killed in your name.

Some people, however, are drawing the line. Recently, and especially since the public outrage over U.S. government plans for yet another bombing attack on Iraq a few weeks ago, Americans are becoming increasingly aware of the Iraqi holocaust being perpetrated in their name. Some are actively disavowing it by taking action to prevent it.

Among other efforts, a large delegation of religious leaders, medical professionals and anti-war activists, lead by former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark and Bishop Thomas Gumbleton of Detroit, will travel to Iraq on May 6 to bring in badly needed medical supplies. Local efforts to raise funds and medical supplies urgently need your support.

If you would like to find out more about the humanitarian crisis in Iraq and the Iraq Sanctions Challenge Delegation, come to a screening of the new documentary "Genocide by Sanctions" at 7:30 tonight in Thompson 102. The screening will be followed by a discussion about what you can do to help the long-suffering people of Iraq and to let your name be among those that stand for humanity and against genocide.

The good life

What do you think about the Bible and what it says about homosexuality? What are your thoughts on what the good book says about how a good man should run his life?

Wait. Before you answer that, hold off one quick second. I forgot to tell you something... I don't care. Your thoughts about religion matter slightly less to me than who won the annual slug race in Tucson last week (I hear the lightning quick little bugger is going on Leno tomorrow!).

Seth Koenig

Here's the drill: you hold your signs up and praise the Lord and tell me I shouldn't do this or I shouldn't do that, and I nod, and I walk off and the only way in which my life has been changed is that I had to waste those few precious moments processing your sentences. The only way in which your life has been changed is that you wasted those few precious moments consuming the additional oxygen it takes to speak.

Now, before you start calling me the anti-Christ, I want to say that I have no real problem with Christianity. What you believe is what you believe, and I am happy you have made that choice in your life and it now guides you. Great. I, too, as a matter of fact, have ties to the religion. The point here is that I don't give a whooping phunt what you think about it.

Some people march around and say that homosexuals are bad and are going to hell or whatever. I don't think the matter is quite so cut and dry, to be honest. I like to think about it like this: if a lesbian saves a small child from a burning building and teaches it a life of kindness, they'll probably get priority at the Pearly Gates over a priest who molested that small child. Is the lesbian a bad person in that case, even though some people interpret the Bible as saying she's damned from the get go? No. Is the priest a good person there, even though the vows they take are often considered a "get-out-of-hell-free" pass? No. In fact, most priests are downright swell people. It's just that, so are gays.

Then there are some folks who like to tell me not to swear, because the Lord looks down on it. Well, if the Lord is where we all conventionally seem to believe he is, he looks down on everything, anyway. And again, if I spend my life helping people, and then say, "@$#@!" when I stub my toe, I'd like to think that I'll be okay when St. Peter and I hypothetically sit down to review my existence on this planet. True, unnecessary swearing often makes one look like he or she has a small vocabulary, but that doesn't have anything to do with religion.

When Jesus roamed the Earth (geez, I make him sound like a Tyrannosaurus or something), I'm guessing he saw a bunch of people calling themselves "civil" running around acting like complete jerks. Being an intelligent and caring guy like he was, he probably had a problem with that. He probably said to himself, "You know, Jesus, these people aren't good people. They don't help each other out, they don't give whooping phunts about human life, they take everything they have for granted, and they act like they're all on self-centered power trips."

The man then did what most of us wouldn't have the time, energy, or wherewithal to do — teach people. Jesus brought back the lost art of kindness. He showed little kids how to play street hockey and include everybody. He reminded stubborn family men that even though they lost a heated bet to their neighbor on last year's World Series, that if they helped the struggling neighbor fix his gutter, they could be friends again — and who knows, maybe next month the family man might need his roof reshingled. He showed people how to pull over and give a complete stranger a jump start. He explained to some careless teenager that he should help that old lady cross the street because she's probably somebody's grandmother, and if she were the teen's grannie, he'd probably want her to be helped out.

He probably showed people why sharing was a cool thing to do.

This is just my opinion, but I don't think Jesus worried too terribly about who was sleeping with who and how often they said the "F-word." Things like that just aren't that important in the long run, and it pains me to think that so many people believe that Jesus was so uptight. As a matter of fact, I don't even think he really cared if people thought he was the son of G-D or not. Idolization wasn't really what he was shooting for, I just think a lot of people severely missed the point.

To be quite frank (okay, so I've been being frank all along), the man's work isn't finished yet. While there are people concerning themselves with things like what music I listen to, there are still jerks out there that are doing a lot worse than tuning in to Nine Inch Nails, or whatever this year's scorn of the church may be.

Instead, I have to hear about what's "wrong" with homosexuality, bad language, and heavy metal (the latter two can sometimes be combined), among other things.

So, for those of you who want to tell me about that: I still don't care. And now that I've said my piece after involuntarily listening to yours all these years, I will no longer waste your time. Please do me the same courtesy, and help someone out on the way home.

Cartoon reinforces stereotypes

To the Editor:

The recent cartoon in the Wednesday, April 21 Collegian was a disgrace to the UMass campus. Kampus Kids by Adam Souliere depicts Native peoples who are half-naked, dressed with war paint and, of course, armed with spears, bows and arrows. In the backdrop of the cartoon is the stereotypical teepee and what looks to be an animal hung like a rotisserie chicken.

The Native community has recently been working very hard at breaking down these stereotypes. The Native American community pushed for a new certificate program which tries to educate students properly about Native people, their history and their vast cultures. We also have put on many cultural programs this year to express ourselves in a way which is inviting to non-Native people, in an effort to educate people who may know little or nothing about Natives.

However, it is cartoons like this one in our school newspaper which frustrate our efforts. These cartoons are the very things that reinforce the stereotypes we are trying to eliminate. We feel it was no coincidence that this cartoon was printed in the first issue of the Collegian following our Native American Social on Sunday in Southwest. We don't feel that this should be tolerated by us or by anybody on-campus, or off-campus, for that matter. We hope that the University as a whole will take notice of this, and not tolerate this type of attitude anymore. We demand some type of action be taken and will not back down as time passes by.
